"BLESSED IS HE WHO CAN UNDERSTAND A JOKE, FOR VERILY THERE BE SOME WHO KNOW NOT A JOKE WHEN THEY SEE IT."
—A more or less ancient proverb.

David Davis says there is no economist like a careful wife. David has come to this conclusion since he discovered that the beautiful awnings over his library windows had been made out of the backs of his old vests.—Fall River Advance.

'Who is that man applauding so vociferously near the front?' asked a friend of a theatrical manager on the first production of a play in an up-town theatre.

'That long-haired man with a light colored coat?'

'Yes.'

'He—he's the author of the play.'—Anon.

A merchant traveler at dinner requested the waiter to bring him a piece of rare beef, and when it came, it was rare indeed.

'Waiter?' he remarked warningly, as he looked at the undone dish.

'Yes, sah,' responded the darkey,

'Take this out, please, and kill it.'—Merchant Traveler.

Life among the Mormons.—'My dear,' said a Mormon wife to her husband, 'I should think that you would be ashamed of yourself, flirting with that Miss B. as you did in church to-day.'

'Flirting with her?' he replied in astonishment. 'Why, we have been engaged for more than three months. It's all over town.'

'Oh, I beg your pardon,' said his wife indifferently. 'If you are engaged to her, I suppose it is all right. When does the happy event occur?'—Phila. Call.

'If all the trees in all the woods were men,
And each and every blade of grass a pen;
If every leaf on every shrub and tree
Turned to a sheet of foolscap, every sea
Were changed to ink, and all earth's living tribes
Had nothing else to do but act as scribes,
And for ten thousand ages, day and night,
The human race should write and write, and write,
Till all the pens and paper were used up,
And each great inkstand was an empty cup,
Still would the scribblers clustered round its brink
Call for more pens, more paper, and more ink.'
—Anon.

Jones—Have you ever heard what became of your runaway wife?

Smith—No, and don't want to. All I know is that she left a note behind saying that she had determined to go on the stage and knew I would never consent.

Jones—Well, I was looking over a Denver paper the other day and saw a most enthusiastic notice of the success made by a new prima donna, and judging from the description she must be your wife.

Smith—A prima donna? That is impossible. My wife could not sing a note.

Jones—But she may have learned. The paper said she took the town by storm.

Smith—By storm, eh?

Jones—Yes.

Smith—That is she.—Phila. Call.

As you approach Cincinnati from the north the railroad runs directly through the beautiful Spring Grove Cemetery, and passengers are always interested in the sights to be seen. In the seat ahead of us was a couple, evidently on a bridal tour, but yet accompanied by a little girl about nine years of age. Some thought the wife was stepmother to the child, and others that the husband had become stepfather; but the mystery was solved as we entered the cemetery. The little one was quick to notice the locality, and as the husband went back to the cooler for a drink she cried out:

'Oh, mamma, this is the place where we buried papa! Maybe we can see his grave!'

'Hush, child!' she whispered.

'But if we do see it,' continued the prattler, in spite of a pinch, 'we won't let on about it, nor say a single word, 'cause it might make our new papa feel cut up!'—Detroit Free Press.

We'll graft the lobster on the hop,
The oyster bed we'll gayly weed,
The cranberry jelly tree we'll flop,
And save the macaroni seed.

The beet root sugar we will get
By tapping of the hickory tree,
Horse chestnuts in the spring we'll set,
That in the autumn colts will be.

We'll prune the climbing sorghum vine,
We'll dig the ruta baga pear,
The clam shall with the pea entwine,
And both shall, mingling, blossom there.

The Berkshire goat its wool shall shed,
The Bantam cow shall feed on hay,
We'll milk the ducks, all thoroughbred,
That steal the eggs the squirrels lay.

A neatly dressed but awkward woman of 20 odd summers sidled up to Chief Clerk Coffeen's desk in Superior Court yesterday, and stood on one foot, waiting for some one to address her.

'What can I do for you, madam?' asked the exquisite chief clerk, after laboriously working his features into one of his most fascinating smiles.

'I—ah—that is, sir, please can I get a divorce?'

'Well,' said Lester, a little startled at the unusual method taken by the lady in applying for one of the staple articles of the Superior Court, 'I don't know about that. You had better consult a lawyer,'

'I don't want no lawyer; I think lawyers are just horrid. I want a divorce, and I want it now.'

'Well, we don't keep them in stock, madam, like ready-made clothes, but if you consult some lawyer who makes divorces a specialty (and there are plenty of them), I think you can have one made to order in time for the evening train.'

'Well, I don't see what's the use of having half a dozen men in your old office if you can't get a divorce for a poor woman who has but two hours to spare before going back to Oshkosh,' and with a disdainful shrug of her pretty shoulders the woman pranced out of the room with a poor opinion of Chicago's divorce mill. —Chicago News.

Two or three weeks ago a pedestrian who was passing a house on Riopelle street heard the sounds of a terrific struggle going on, and as he looked in at the front door a boy about 12 years of age, who sat in the hall, quietly observed:

'It's only the old folks having a little row, stranger.'

'Do they have 'em often?' asked the man.

'Almost every day.'

'If I were in your place I'd stand at the door here and charge ten cents admission fee. It's worth the money to see a family riot like this, and you might as well make a few dollars as to let the chance slip.'

The boy said he would think of it, and the pedestrian waited until the man had choked the woman as black as a plum, and then passed on. Yesterday he chanced that way again, and there was another row going on, and the same boy sat on the doorsteps.

'I'll see the show,' said the man as he pulled out his wallet. 'Has my advice profitted you?'

'Stranger, I can't take your money,' replied the lad.

'Why?'

'Because I'm a square boy. For a week or so every fight in there was as square as a dice and worth the price of admission, but as soon as a crowd began to come and the gate money began to run up to eighty or ninety cents, dad and mam began to hippodrome on the public. That blood on his nose was put there half an hour ago, and mam's black eye is three weeks old. They want me to stand in with them and deceive the public, but I can't do it. Let the best man win or quit the business is my motto. Pass on stranger, for this is a put-up job to gull the confiding public.'—Detroit Free Press.

FOR THE YOUNG FOLKS.

Some one tells an amusing story of a London dandy who, while traveling in India, went into a jungle to hunt tigers. All things went well until the dandy came upon a large tiger, and then he began to call at the top of his voice for a cab. The story ends at that point, leaving the reader to guess whether the vehicle in question saved him, or whether the tiger, frightened out of its wits, fled. Of another species is the adopted son of James Lawrence, a guide and hunter of the Yosemite Valley, in California.—Mr. Lawrence makes his winter camp near Big Tree Station, on Alder Creek, a stream that runs into the Merced River. On February 25, 1884, the boy, who is a half-breed Indian, eleven years old, went hunting. When he had passed about an hour in the forest, with pine trees towering far above, he caught sight of a deer. At the first fire the animal fell, and the young hunter sprang forward to hang his game from the limb of a tree. The boy had drawn a knife, when to his surprise the buck jumped up and attacked him viciously. So hard pressed was the lad that he ran up a tree. In the meantime, a dog, which belonged to the boy, took it upon himself to worry the buck, and for several minutes there was a hubbub in the heart of the forest. When, from loss of blood, the deer sank on the beaten snow, young Lawrence swung himself down from his perch and again drew his knife so as to bleed the game.' But there was a second interruption—a turn in the current of events much more startling than the first. The bristling hound, which had been panting after his merry-go-round with the buck, stiffened his muscles and growled savagely. The boy at the same instant became aware of the swift approach of another enemy, nor did it take him long to see two mountain lions, sweeping along side by side, their heads bent almost upon the snow.—The beasts had heard the sounds of the combat and evidently had determined in their hunger to profit by the result. Strong and steady of nerve though the boy was, he ran back over his trail to the camp on the Alder. He was pursued by one of the lions, which, however, seeing that the other beast had stopped at the scene of the fight, soon returned to partake of the feast. Young Lawrence escaped, and afterward returning, with some men tracked the lions far into the mountains.

The Apache Indian is pronounced by Wagner Ketchum, a noted trapper of the plains, to be the best natural hunter in America. The endurance of the young men of the tribe is very great. They frequently run sixty miles in chase of deer, and they have been known to prolong the chase to a distance of one hundred miles. Think of running a hundred miles without rest!

As the deer starts away in its flight, it leaps from twenty to thirty feet at a time. The Indian follows steadily, and, though left behind at first, the trail is as plain to him as the turnpike road would be to a white man. Out of sight and sound of danger, the deer lessens its gait.

At the first glimpse of the pursuing hunter, away it goes again. Every halt of the kind tells against the deer, for at every break its muscles become stiffer and less active. The Indian never halts. His gait is steady. He may be thirsty, but he knows that the deer is less able to bear thirst.

More than that, the Apache knows that the deer is doomed whenever it seeks water. There is no hope for it after it reaches a stream. It plunges in, and takes long deep draughts. Looking back, it sees the hunter approaching. Refreshed, the deer starts again; but it has laden itself with the weight of the water. It no longer can make long leaps, nor can it keep from stopping often.

Thus the Apache draws near his prey. Indications on the trail show that the animal is weakening. He sees marks where the deer has been resting on its knees. He knows that the race is run. He makes a final burst of speed, and with a yell of triumph, leaps upon the animal, trembling and nearly dead. When the Apache hunter thus secures his prey, he starts back toward his camp, nor does he halt long on the return, lest he becomes too stiff to travel.

Railway Jack.

A dog at Lewes near Brighton has gained the name of Railway Jack, owing to his having traveled over most of the railways in England.

Jack jumps on a train that is just about to start, and while the train is in motion he looks about the country as if he enjoyed the ride. No doubt he does.

When the train stops, Jack jumps down and makes friends at once with the station-master. He is well known to many station-masters in England. Jack seldom visits any station more than once. He is fond of change.

Some time ago Jack was away from his home at Lewes longer than usual. His friends gave him up as lost, thinking he had been killed on some railway. But one day Jack came home, to the joy of all who knew him. His leg had been hurt by some train, which had no doubt kept him so long from home.

The wife of the manager of the London and Brighton line gave Jack a collar. Some one was mean enough to steal it. Judge Hawkins, hearing of the loss when at Lewes, gave Jack another collar, which he seems proud to wear. He has won prizes at several exhibitions, many of which he wears at dog shows.—Our Little Ones.

Willie Russ, the son of Judge J. D. Russ of the town of Butler, Georgia, has two pet goats, which are well-kept, good-natured, and obedient creatures. Like all other animals of their species, however, they are fond of climbing.—One evening not long ago they climbed into an empty box-car, attached to a freight train, and what should the brakeman do but lock them in! Willie missed his goats that night, and throughout the following day the boys of Butler searched high and low for the lost pets. As for the goats, they remained in the car until it was opened in Savannah, and then they scared the freight-agent by jumping out and darting wildly around the yard. Upon the discovery, telegrams were sent out, making inquiries as to the ownership of the animals, and Willie was given the opportunity of claiming his own. When the two travelers reached the railway station at Butler, on their return, they were greeted by a great crowd of boys, who gave them three cheers.

Human nature among the young folks in France is much like that met in this broad America. Jules, a boy of six years, and Annette, his sister, aged four, live in Paris. Each was given a sugar cake. Jules ate his before Annette had eaten a quarter of hers, however. Then Jules, with a winning smile, said:

'Mamma, please tell Annette to give me the rest of her cake; it will teach her to be good-hearted!'

A little girl, romping with her St. Bernard dog, paused before an engraving. The picture represented 'Daniel in the lions den,' and, as Daniel had fasted for a long time, he looked quite lean.

'Poor things!' said the little girl, sympathizing with the lions, 'he's so dreadfully thin I'm sure there'll never be enough to go round!'

Annie was five years old and her friend Sabina was eight. One morning, during a visit to an aunt, Annie boasted that she could read a great deal better than Sabina.

'Well,' said the aunt, by way of rebuke, 'wouldn't it sound better if somebody else should say it?'

'I think it would,' replied the innocent; 'I have such a bad cold I can't say it well!'

Somebody asked the four-year-old son of a Bostonian what he would do if his father should die.

'Why,' said the youngster, 'I'd wear my new boots to the funeral!'
