to eat, which she would never do, and on these occasions Watkins would be compel to look up something to eat. She was gruff to him and never kind or treated him as a wife ought to treat her husband.

To the fourth interrogatory, that since the marriage of the parties, Mr Watkins has had the control of the property.

The fifth and sixth interrogatories waived.

To the seventh interrogatory, that deponent thinks that the cause of the difficulty between the parties was that Mrs Watkins wanted to rent the property to Mr Black, which the defendant objected, and that this led to the filing of the bill but he does not know this of his own knowledge.

The eighth interrogatory waived.

And thereupon A. B. Hagner Esq. solicitor for the Complainant exhibited his cross-interrogatory, files and therewith returned to which the witness answered:

That he knows Watkins character for sobriety. He has seen him in company with others, when he has been tipsy, but has never seen him disguised so far as not to be able to attend to business but once which was the occasion referred to by Mr Dorsett. His character for sobriety has been as good as most gentlemen in the neighborhood. His reputation is that of a good-natured, well disposed young man. It is reputed, that he talks sometimes too much, but never to harm any one by his statements.

Daniel E. Davis a witness of lawful age produced by the defendant being duly sworn and examined to the interrogatories filed and returned as aforesaid deposes and says:

To the first interrogatory, that he does know the parties. He has known Watkins ever since he went to school with him, and Mrs Watkins since one or two years before Mr Beard's death.

The second interrogatory waived.

To the third interrogatory that deponent lived at the house with the parties two years. They seemed to live very well together until the last year, and # until Black began to visit at the house. From that time she always seemed dissatisfied. Watkins her husband, seemed never able to do any thing to please her, or could do any thing that could satisfy her. Watkins treated her very kindly and affectionately under all circumstances, and never saw him cross to her at any time.

To the fourth interrogatory that Mr Watkins seemed to have the control of the property. If Watkins # ordered the servants to do any thing, she would sometimes countermand and prevent it.

To the fifth interrogatory that the parties were acquainted with each other well, before their intermarriage, as deponent thinks. The deponent # lived before their intermarriage about a quarter of a mile from Mr Watkins, and Watkins about a mile and a half a two miles. He thinks she knew all about his character before she married him.
