LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE, 1912.

An Always Dependable Magazine.

If the publishers of Lippincotts are planning any New Year resolutions relative to making better numbers than that for January, they have their work cut out for them; for the January Lippincotts is a great big, satisfying issue, full of good things. First, there's a complete novel—"Kilmorgan's Heir," by Kathryn Jarboe. This is a tale of the southwest, with virile plot and charmful character-drawing. After the death of her father, the youthful heroine, Carmelita, sets out to seek her fortune. She is adopted by a clergyman and his sister, and later the minister falls in love with her, but her heart is true to a young English ranchman, James Dart, who befriended her in the old days, and whom she has loved with a blind devotion ever since. They meet again, marry, and are radiantly happy until they are separated by the machinations of Dart's father, an unscrupulous old British nobleman. Carmelita's child is stolen, and she disappears, but in the end all is explained and they are reunited. The Arizona ranch life is depicted with rare skill.
