Vet's Suit to Open Institute Lost

brary was made because the library figured in a similar suit and was finally directed, as a public education institution, to admit students of both races to its classes of instruction in library training.

Not Publicly Controlled

The art institute, it was found, did not fall in the class of a public institution, because "to make a corporation a public one, its members must not only be appointed by public authority, but subject to its control."

The institute, last year received a $26,000 appropriation from municipal funds and $16,500 from State funds.

In return for this money and by agreement dating back 60 years, each member of the City Council and of the State Senate has the right to appoint to the institute one student free of tuition charge.

Funds Held State Matter

Asked to prevent continued payment of these funds as long as the Institute discriminates against colored students, Judge Chestnut indicated that the matter of funds was purely a State matter and not for Federal courts to decide.

He also pointed out that the Maryland Legislature grants State aid to many private institutions for charitable and educational purposes, "some of which admit as students or inmates only white persons, while others are for the benefit of only colored persons."

Judge Chestnut also noted that Norris had not received nor sought appointment as a scholarship student to the institute, "and is therefore not suing as a beneficiary of the contract" between the city and the school.

"Therefore," the judge concluded, "the case does not present for decision what may be the Federal rights of a plaintiff having such an appointment."

Rights Violation Charged

The Norris suit was filed in U.S. District Court in March, 1947. Pointing out that he was not even allowed to see the register when he applied for admittance to the school the previous November, he contended that he was rejected "solely because of his race and color."

Since the City Council scholarship appointment contract was effected in 1887, four colored students were appointed and attended the institute under this agreement.

They were Harry T. Pratt, appointed in 1891 by Councilman Harry S. Cummings; Walter Mills, in 1892, by Councilman Cummings; William H. Davis, in 1895, by Councilman James Doyle, white; and Howard Gross, in 1901, by Councilman Samuel G. Davis, white.

Colored Students Banned

However, in 1905, the institute's committee on schools of art and design passed a resolution limiting the student body to white only. Copies of which were sent to the City Council.

The ban, which has been in effect ever since, reads:

"Whereas the appointment of colored pupils to the school, it is believed, has caused a large decrease in the number of white pupils attending the institute, thus lessening its power for good to the community, be it resolved that hereafter only respectable white pupils will be admitted to the school."

Under these circumstances, Mr. Norris contended, he would be denied admittance to the school even if appointed by his City Councilman.

Appeal of Case Considered

Mr. Norris, 33, who lives at 1102 W. Franklin St., graduated in 1936 from Douglass High School, where he made exceptional grades in art and where his work was frequently on display. In the Army, he served with a combat engineer unit in the South Pacific.

The NAACP is considering whether or not to appeal Judge Chestnut's decision.

The litigation was financed with a portion of a $2,000 fund given to the NAACP by the AFRO-AMERICAN newspapers for the express purpose of instituting legal action to break color barriers affecting Baltimore citizens. Attorneys for Norris were Charles H. Houston and Fred S. Weisgal.
