POULTRY NOTES.

[Written for THE TRANSCRIPT.]

Supposing we now have a good strain of birds, we shall take up the question of food. To obtain best results we must feed a balanced ration. We may balance this ourselves or place the food before the hen and she will balance her own ration. The ordinary farmer does not understand the scientific terms used in treaties on feeding poultry and so calls it all "bosh", if you mention "16 to 1". They will laugh heartily and know you are speaking of politics and Wm. Jennings Bryan, but ask him if he feeds a ration 1 lb. of protein to 4.6 lb. carbohydrates to his chicks, he won't laugh because that's "bosh."

We demand more than nature intended from fowls. Nature made a hen lay a dozen or so eggs in warm weather. Man has produced from that specimen a fowl that will lay ordinarily from 100 eggs up to 300. Oregon State Experiment Station has produced "one" such hen. Besides nature intended eggs only in warm weather. We have twisted and bred for our heaviest yield in fall and winter when prices are high. So the present day fowl is a man-made egg machine. We must feed enough food to keep her body in healthy condition and the surplus will go to eggs. Eggs are high in protein.

Protein is found in linseed meal, oil meal, beef scrap, gluten meal and meat meal. Green bone is a most excellent food, but should be perfectly sweet and not tainted. Corn is high in carbohydrates and should be used sparingly as it is fattening. Green bone should be used sparingly. Wheat is the best single grain to feed fowls, and when meat scrap is kept before the fowls they lay very well on these two articles of diet.

The poultry plants that "force" for eggs divide their flocks into "layers" which are fed on highly concentrated foods to produce the highest number of eggs possible, and "breeders" who are not forced, but fed on a sensible ration and their eggs used for hatching purposes. So we must couclude that forcing for egg production will weaken the offspring. Few farmers divide their flocks through the winter months, so feed so that they will not endanger the vitality of their little chicks that will hatch from eggs from these hens.

Grain alone in winter will not give a high egg yield. Green food may be supplied in cabbage, hung high so they must jump to reach it; apples and raw potatoes (which are very high in carbohydrates). Such feeds as are grown on the farm should be utilized so as to keep the cost as low as possible.

The man or woman behind the feed box has a great deal to do with the egg yield. Through the consumer the fowl on free range finds quite a part of her own feed and so a little wheat, just a little night and morning, furnishes her material for eggs. But through fall and winter she needs extra feed if you expect her to produce eggs.

Scratching sheds with a litter about six inches deep should be provided for fall and winter use. This may be roughly and cheaply constructed. Straw or chaff straw preferably should be used. Mix wheat, corn and oats equal portion by weight (winter oats are much too fibrous, therefore, hard to digest for amount of nutriment obtained) so the first two, wheat and corn, make a good grain feed. Throw this in the litter late in the evening so the birds can get down and go to work early in the morning. About 10 or 11 o'clock feed a mash. Wet mash has given the best results, though the dry mash will give very good results where the wet is impracticable.

A good mash is 3 parts bran, 1 part corn meal, ½ part alfalfa or clover meal, 2 parts meat scraps, teaspoon salt. Mix this with milk or warm water, or feed dry in hoppers.

A more stimulating or higher in protein ration may be used, but if you are going to use any of the fowls fed this mash as breeders in spring it is best to be careful.

About the last of June add 50 lbs. inseed meal to your mash and produce an early molt. Continue this until the new feathers come out.

Grit, oyster shell, charcoal and "fresh water" should be always before the fowls. While snow is on the ground and during the extreme cold winds the fowls should be kept confined. Indeed, where the accommodations are good a little south run may be penned off from the house and the fowls kept up through the entire winter. But plenty of exercise must be provided. Feed only sweet grain and do not allow any of the mash to freeze or sour and be eaten afterwards, or you will have bowel trouble.

Do not overfeed, and yet underfeeding is as great a sin. Make no sudden change in your feeding ration or your egg yield will drop.

To produce large individual eggs and lots of them, a hen must have a long deep body, big in frame for the breed, and to possess the health and vigor to convert her food into eggs. Milk, either sweet or sour, is a food high in protein, and may be used where possible and cut down the meat ration.

Give a good feed of wheat scattered in the litter and corn on the cob about an hour before sundown. Never give all they will eat until the night feed. Mr. Brooks, the miller, has a mash he prepares by a formula that is used by a poultry plant in New Jersey, and from results the users are claiming, it must be excellent.
