POULTRY NOTES.

[Written for THE TRANSCRIPT.]

After a late winter as we just had, a great many fowls will be lacking in vigor and weak constitutionally, and should not be used as breeders. Only those that have gone through the winter vigorous and healthy should be used. Yet it is safe to say that 9-tenths of the county will pay no attention to that nor to selecting the egg only as to its beauty. Hence we shall find many puny chicks and a great loss, and about last of May everybody will be asking everybody else "what do you suppose can be the matter with my little chicks?" They will lay it to everything under the sun except the right thing, which will be in a great many cases inherited weakness. A chick of that kind any disease will find easy prey. Chicks from hens are more vigorous and larger than pullets' offsprings. After the chicks are hatched avoid overheating and chilling. The latter happens most often. It will invariably cause bowel trouble.

Give no feed at all for 48 hours at least. But during that time a few drops of sour milk may be given. If the chicks will not drink it force a few drops down their throat with a medicine dropper. Be sure this is done before any food at all has been given.

For the first three days give 1 part egg run through the meat grinder to 6 parts oats. Give just a little of this 5 times a day. Have sharp sand or baby chick grit sprinkled on the floor, also charcoal, where they can get it. Give the big feed at night.

Some people prefer feeding cooked feed for the first week or two. A bread made of 3 parts corn meal, 1 part bran, ½ part oat meal, 1 tablespoon meat meal, 1 teaspoonful salt, 1 teaspoonful soda and 3 raw eggs, and cooked thoroughly is an ideal food. After the first three or four days there should be a little commercial chick feed sprinkled in the litter to make the little fellows scratch first. Of course this should be where the old hen could not reach it, if a hen is used.

Give the first feed of the chick feed, at ten place before them a dry mash or chowder of 2 parts oats, 2 parts corn meal, 2 parts wheat bran, 1 part sifted meal scrap.

Place this dry in a vessel deep enough for them not to waste it. Leave for 15 minutes or so, then remove. At 2 o'clock give another feed of the chick feed in the litter and at night or about 6 o'clock give all the mash or chowder they will consume. With grit and charcoal before them they will grow like weeds, if they have access to green food, if not something must be used to take its place.

This feed may be used until about six weeks old, when a mash of 150 lbs bran, 100 lbs corn meal, 100 lbs middlings, 100 lbs beef scraps, 2½ lbs salt, 3 lbs charcoal, and a grain feed of corn and wheat may be used.

So many persons think that moldy, musty grain or bran or chick feed will not hurt poultry. Never was a more mistaken idea conceived. Just because it dosen't kill at the first feed or so is no sign that it is not undermining the constitution and laying the foundation for sickness. Besides, the chicks will not grow near so fast as on pure, sweet food.

A great deal of the commercial chick feeds on the markets are musty. They may have gotten so after being put on the market, but that doesn't save the life of the chicks. Be ever watchful for vermin, you can't afford to feed them.

Watch for mistakes; never make the same twice, cut down expense where ever possible without affecting welfare of your birds.

Watch particularly as the hot weather comes on that the young chix do not over crowd and get over heated, it can happen in one night particularly the hot sultry nights when not one breath of air is stirring. Those birds once overheat never can be made to produce good stock. It is a set back that no feed, attention or care afterward can over come. I know this as I have had it to happen for me twice.

Prevention is better than cure. It's impossibe to give too much fresh air to poultry but so easy to give too little.
