cellar for beef steak during the winter. The head was made into mince meat, the tallow was rendered up and made into candles; the fat to the knee was made into oil for use in the kitchen. They had a lamp something like a tea kettle top which they would pour oil in, light it and this lighted the kitchen. The candles were used in the house and the beef would last until the next December when another was killed. The hide was cured and a large hide would make from eight to ten pairs of traces which were cut up in the winter, twisted and hung up with a weight until used in the spring for plowing. So you can plainly see that the farmer with the tough plow lines and the beef hide for traces was to very little expense. The hair was cut off and made into hame strings.

Now the farmer also had what was called a hominy mortar that was bored out and burned out of a large log that stood on its end and they beat the corn into hominy. For a large family it would take ½ a bushel a week and enough for two weeks beaten at a time. The fireplace in the kitchen was six feet wide with a rod above it and it had hooks on it so that the woman would boil clothes, cook her dinner of cabbage and pork or beef.

The front of the fireplace was paved and they could put three johnny cake boards which were made of oak. Johnny cake in those days was a common diet for two meals a day. For dinner they would bake a large pone. We ate more corn bread than wheat bread. The farmer would have to have about three times a week short cake for his colored help. The farmer had his own wheat ground and always had a large supply of flour and meal.

We had plenty of nice fruits, fine apples among which were the Long Pippin, Maiden Blush, the Cart House and the Red Streak. Our apple orchards were large having six or eight varieties with seventy-five trees of each variety. We had peaches in abundance; we would plant an acre and call it a nursery. The peach trees were not large but what we called the nature peach. The Red Cling, the White Free and the Yellow Free were all nature peaches.

They dried peaches and apples in the sun which would last the entire year. We had all sorts of berries like the raspberry and blackberry We had the blue plum which grow in the fence corners; we had the damson which we preserved. We had pear trees in the middle of the field which grew about twenty-five baskets to the tree. We had fine cherries and these fruits were perfect as we had no insect to destroy them. We had the black raspberry which was one of the best berries but today we see very few of them. At Mrs. Hayes field there was a woods which was owned by the venerable Geo. Webster. When I was a boy I have seen as many as fifty teams there gathering raspberries which were very large and they were very abundant in the woods.

The average farmer did not slaughter less than twenty hogs which were well cared for. They were (cleaned) killed and the lard was put in a large firkin which held about 150 pounds instead of cans.

The pork was salted away and the farmer had a plenty. In those days the farmer was at home a great deal, when he traveled he went on horseback, most of them had a gig. On Saturday afternoons they would go to the villages and talk of the farm and crops. We grew very fine potatoes including the Mercer, which was a winter potato, and the Lobster, which was a very productive potato used in spring and summer. When spring came they would flush the ground and work it with a plough as we had no cultivators and perhaps for the last working they would run through a spike harrow. Our people did not grow hay but we had the blue grass and white head clover. We cut the wheat with a cradle, then stacked it, and in four or five weeks would begin to tread it out with horses. After the wheat was finished the farmer had a little time off; then the family would go to a camp meeting in our district and have our friends visit us, then when they had camp in the fourth district and we would go and enjoy their hospitalities. They had a religious revival which helped the people a great deal.

In those days our mothers raised a great many ducks, chickens, peafowls, turkeys and guineas, and made a great deal of butter. There were three boats running from Turner's Creek and the captains acted as commission merchants and carried the poultry, eggs and butter away for our mothers. We did not have side shows in our county but when the Sabbath day came we all went to church, then when church would let out I have seen 300 colored people waiting to take it after we came out. Our colored people then were plain but well-dressed and very mannerly. It was seldom a white man had to unhitch his horse as the colored man was there asking to do it with his hat in hand and bowing.

To be continued and I hope with more interest. MEMORY.

Couple Elude Pursuers.

Driving to Elkton in an automobile, after eluding scores of friends determined to follow them and see their wedding, Miss Jennie Mae Howser, adopted daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Kenton, of Centreville, and Dr. William Henry Fisher, county health officer, were married there Wednesday evening of last week. The ceremony was quietly performed by Rev. H. T. Quigg, pastor of Elkton Methodist Episcopal Church. Mrs. Fisher was active in church work and is a musician of ability. She was stenographer for State's Attorney Edwin H. Brown and one of the most popular and attractive young women of Centreville, Dr. Fisher is a son of Mrs. Hannah Fisher, of Princess Anne, and is a graduate of the University of Maryland. After a honeymoon trip through the North, Mr. and Mrs. Fisher will reside in Centreville. The bride is a niece of Town Commissioner Charles Q. Snyder and a sister of Dr. Upton G. Howser, of Washington, D. C.
