The Lusitania.

This expression has been upon the lips of the American people during the past week more than any other utterance possibly, and the sinking of the great ship by German torpedoes with the loss of 1296 lives, among whom are 108 American citizens, has stirred the blood of our people to its depths. The gravest situation in the history of the country has been President Wilson's burdens, but like the great man that he is, the American people have trusted him to deliver us from a situation that has confronted no generation since the Civil War, and he will bring the issue to a successful conclusion without resorting to war, and without any reflection upon the honors of our nation. Good Lord, deliver us from the horrors of war. Let us keep close to the path of justice and right, but great as may be the provocation in the minds of many, let us not sacrifice the flower of our young manhood for a disaster in which we are inclined to believe the headlessness of these American passengers lead them to their death.
