MRS. DANA A SUICIDE AND QUICKLY BURIED.

She Had Been Melancholy—Leaves Baby Year Old—Family Prominent in England.

Nantucket, June 18.—The romance of Jessie Holliday Dana came to a sorry ending to-day.

The smiling little English girl who came to America some years ago to become the wife in Socialist fashion of Edmund Trowbridge Dana, grandnephew of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, lies to-night in a plain pine box in a rude grave in the Newtown cemetery here.

Less than 24 hours had elapsed since she ended her life in Nantucket harbor.

No mourners save her husband—outwardly unperturbed—went with the body on its last lonesome journey. No service, no word was spoken over it.

And when the last clod of earth struck upon the coffin, a tiny piece of broken slate with the words "J. H. D., '84-'15, Jessie Holliday Dana, Little Comrade," scribbled on it, was all there was left to tell the story.

Dana, the husband, placed the rude stone there; scribbled the words. Then he gathered wild flowers and strewed them over the fresh mound; placed a rough-hewn stone at its foot, a red geranium at its head.

Jessie Holliday Dana was at rest.

Dana took full charge of the burial. He call the undertaker, waived aside the offer of a hearse, preferring an ordinary wagon; had the body put in the plain pine box, and himself, with only the undertaker and an assistant, trundled it off to the little cemetery.

Mrs. Dana would not have wished any ceremony; any elaborate funeral, he said. She received none.

Mrs. Dana was the daughter of Henry Holliday, a rich mine owner of England, and had enjoyed every educational advantage that wealth and social position could commend. She met Dr. Danna in England, when he went abroad to study social conditions, and a friendship ripened into a matrimonial ceremony. Mrs. Dana had been a nervous wreck for months, and had gone to Nantucket in search of a restoration to health.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Dana are well-known here where he spent a year as a member of the faculty of Washington College.
