Annapolis police going to training school

ANNAPOLIS — Police in Annapolis are currently undergoing a police training course which began Wednesday and will continue for several weeks, on order of police commissioner George W. Rawlings.

All policemen will be required to attend the training school.

Subjects to be studied during the course include public relations, courtesy, courtroom demeanor, safety and accident prevention, the City code, and departmental Rules and Regulations.

At completion of the training program, monthly refresher courses will be held in order to keep the policemen informed of new trends in policing procedures.

Important Adjunct

According to Commissioner Rawlings, the training plan has long been considered as an important adjunct to routine police work, but had been deferred. With the police department at full strength with 30 patrolmen, two sergeants, a lieutenant, and the chief, it was decided to go ahead with the plan.

State's Attorney C. Osborne Duvall conducted the opening session, last Wednesday. FBI agents and City Attorney John B. Wright will conduct future classes.

Commissioner Rawlings also announced plans to award cash prizes to police officers who gain high efficiency ratings. This plan has to be approved by the Mayor and city aldermen before being adopted, however.
