Cliburn and the National Symphony

BY NORVALS PERKINS

Last Tuesday evening, Van Cliburn and the National Symphony gave us a large Connection Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto.

It is a piece in the grand manner with just enough structural ingenuity for its broadly romantic message.

Mr. Cliburn played it warmly, from the plaintive theme in its opening measures through to its triumphant climax. His technique easily disposed of any difficulties, leaving the orchestra, audience and pianist free to commune together.

This is not an unexpected dividend of a comfortable program such as this.

The novelty of the evening was the American composer Charles Ives' 2nd Symphony, written between 1896 and 1900, but not performed until 1951. It is not quite clear why this should be: since the work is only mildly unorthodox. Certainly, by 1920, it ought to have been acceptable.

This wouldn't be an issue, except that apparently, there is a movement to promote Ives as a craggy Yankee type who was ahead of his time.

On its merits as a piece of music, disregarding the disturbing about Ives Americana, it is a good (but not that good) symphony with here and there some rugged moments that use the full orchestral resources. Still, there is something faintly into the insurance business instead of sticking to composing.

The program opener was Rossini's Overture to Semiramide. Dr. Mitchell gave it a brisk and cheerful reading. On the whole, a satisfactory evening.

Do not ask us if we miss her; There's such a vacant place, Of ours think we hear her footsteps, And see her smiling face.
Days of sadness still come o'er us, Tears in silence often flow; Memory keeps her ever dear us, Though she left us one year ago.

Broken is the family circle
Since one has passed away.

In the better world above.

NOW ISTHEN! If I could see you

I would take the last step from dying land to living land. The last sigh from you would not feel so bad.
I did not see you die
I only know you went far away
And never said good-bye.
His pleasant way and smiling face Are a pleasure to recall.
He had a kindly word for each, And spoke to all.
Some day I hope to meet him, Some day, I know not when
To clasp his hand in the better land
Never to part again.
