Jessye Coston, Baltimore baritone, shows promise

By ADAH K. JENKINS

Jessye Coston, promising Baltimore baritone and honor student at the Westminister Choir School, was presented at the fourth recital of a concert series at St. Paul Methodist Church.

Mr. Coston most rewarding maturity, both vocally and musically.

Those who heard his concert here a season ago could appreciate his development in technical and interpretive ability combined with confidence and an expansive warmth that established immediate rapport with his listeners. In an engaging manner he combines dignity with inmate modesty.

During his program the soloist demonstrated ability to handle the lyric qualities such as the Purcell aria as well as the dramatic challenge of "The Trumpet Shall Sound" from "Messiah".

* * *

PERHAPS the most difficult offering was the Beethoven song cycle, done in German, with discriminating contrasts in phrasing and projection of the meaning of the eight numbers.

Aaron Copland's arrangement of two old American hymns and a group of spirituals radiated an inner glow of genuine sincerity.

Carefully prepared piano accompaniments, although somewhat overpowering at times, were played by Lemuel Henson, the progressive choirmaster and organist at St. Paul. In April Mr. Henson, who arranged the entire series, will present the St. Paul Choir in concert.

The Handel Choir of Baltimore, under the highly capable direction of Saul Lilienstein, continued this season its customary valuable contribution to the local musical scene by the presentation of outstanding works that are seldom heard here.

* * *

THE MARCH CONCERT at the Peabody was devoted to two of Bach's most imaginative and brilliant cantatas and the "Nelson" Mass by Haydn. (Named in honor of Lord Nelson's victory at sea).

The first cantata based on Luther's familiar hymn "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God", is developed in eight parts, interspersed with recitatives, solts, duets and ending in a mightly chorale.

BACH's mystical meditative style for the soloists was a strikingly contrasted with the vigor and complexity of the choral sections.

For the second cantata—No. 50 the majestic "Now Has Come Salvation",—the Handel Choir was divided into two choruses.

Members of the Baltimore Symphony performed the elaborate orchestration and the chorus answered chorus in antiphonal style that achieved splendid climaxes.

The Hayden Mass, a choral masterpiece in the flourishing Italian Baroque tradition, was sung with confidence that will increase, no doubt with more familiarity.

* * *

SOLOISTS were Marajean Marvin, soprano; Ellen King, contralta, Ralph Marquiss tenor and Frank Whitmore, bass, all of whom sang with professional polish and appreciation.

In May the Handel Choir will complete the season with acapello works by Brahms, Dvorak, Starer and English madrigalists.
