says he was one of the White House sit-down strategists, told the AFRO the 11 civil rights workers sprung the demonstration with that purpose, because "we thought only drastic action" would cause President Johnson to act in Selma, Ala.

The spokesman, who requested that he not be identified, added that more "way out" demonstrations—one calling for persons to block traffic by placing their bodies on main thoroughfares — are in the making and could be expected to take place "any time."

Another civil rights worker who said he was in on the planning of the White House strategy also indicated that the manuever was intended to bring "about a more aggressive approach to pressuring President Johnson to dispatch Federal troops to Alabama.

SPEAKING to a mob of reporters at the White House East Gate where the demonstrators entered under the guise of tourists Thursday morning, Dick Brown, a member of Washington ACT, said:

"A lot of us are tired of that walking around. . .That marching is done for as far as I'm concerned. . .We want to do something that means something."

LATE Thursday evening, nine of the 11 demonstrators were still sealed in the corridors of the Executive Mansion and had begun a hunger strike. The sit down began shortly after 11 a.m.
