School officials liable for violating pupil rights

By Charlotte Moulton

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The Supreme Court ruled 5 to 4 Tuesday that school board members are liable for damages to a student who can show his constitutional rights were intentionally violated.

Justice Byron R. White spoke for the majority in the case of two Mena, Ark., high school girls who were suspended for spiking the punch at a school party, in violation of regulations.

The girls, Peggy Strickland and Virginia Crain, sued the school board, two administrators and the school district. The complaint asked, among other things, for damages and an order removing the suspension from their record.

They invoked an 1871 civil rights law which makes subject to suit any person who deprives another of his federal rights.

The decision was the second this year giving new rights to students. The earlier one, requiring a hearing — however informal — prior to a student's suspension, was based on the Constitution's guarantee of "due process of law" rather than a federal statue.

The ruling in the spiked punch case drew a stiff dissent from Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., on behalf of the four members of the court appointed by President Richard M. Nixon.

Powell, who has served on both the Virginia state and Richmond city school boards, said the decision is likely to discourage qualified persons from going into public education.

White said the 1871 statute must be construed to give school officials some immunity from suit. But he said absolute immunity would not help them enough to offset the absence of a remedy for students "subjected to intentional or otherwise inexcusable deprivations."

"We hold that a school board member is not immune from liability for damages under (the 1871 law) if he knew or reasonably should have known that the action he took within his sphere of official responsibility would violate the constitutional rights of the student affected, or if he took the action with the malicious intention to cause a deprivation of constitutional rights or other injury to the student," the opinion said.
