Study says males 18-30 jail bound

"If you are black, between the ages of 18 and 30 and living in Baltimore City, the chances that you will go to jail are seven times greater than anyone else, anywhere else in the state, according to Bill Lamb, associate director of the Community Corrections Task Force.

Mr. Lamb claims he reached that conclusion after his group completed the study of the entire corrections system earlier this year. The task force compiled the table which accompanies this article.

Mr. Lamb points out that the figures were obtained on random days in April and June of this year. The figures include the numbers of persons confined at Baltimore City Jail on those days (April 30 and June 30); those on probation in the state; those confined to the various prisons; those on parole and the total numbers.

The first table represents the number of persons under various kinds of supervision throughout the state. At the time the figures were compiled the prison population (including local jails) was about 6,382; at the time of this writing the numbers have increased to about 6,500 with some 300 waiting in local jails to be transferred to state intsitutions.

BALTIMORE CITY

The significant fact revealed by the statistics indicates, in a more narrow sense, that outside of Baltimore City, for every 100 persons entering the criminal justice system, 76 are placed on probation with only 24 going to jail.

In Baltimore City three out of four persons entering the system are placed on probation while one out of four are jailed. On the other hand, if the defendant is black and between 18 and 30 the odds shift drastically. Of every 100 black youth in that age bracket, who enters the system, 58 will go away on probation with the remaining 48 being confined to prison.

"The historical fact," says Bill Lamb, "is that those figures are steadily increasing and have done so in the past without notice."

However, that's just one man's opinion.

One woman's opinion, that of State Senator Verda F. Welcome, doubts the validity of the figures and what Mr. Lamb claims they mean.

"I don't believe it," she avows.

"That seems to me to be just another one of those situations where a bunch of white people get together to define and interpret black [illegible] with something negative."

MISLEADING

Supreme Bench Judge John Hargrove has another point of view. "I'm not so sure the figures reveal the true story," he told the AFRO, "they appear misleading. What seems to me to be closer to the truth is that the sheer number of blacks who come into the criminal justice system of that age group for violent crimes against persons simply outnumber all others."

To emphasize his point, Judge Hargrove reveals that on the day of this interview he had tried 20 cases. "Only one was white and he was charged with fasle pretense."

By way of further explanation, Judge Hargrove said, "it's not a racial thing. It's more a matter of background. What happens is that by the time a young black man 18 years old reaches this court he's been through the probation system.

"He has no job. He appears in court alone; his parents either don't care or don't know. Sending the black man into the community is like inviting him to rob your house. If he has no visible family or economic support he has to do something to survive.

"On the other hand, usually the case with whites in that age group, you'll find that the defendant has a good job. He appears in court with his mother and father and his record, if not clean, is only of minor juvenile offenses."

80 PER CENT

Judge Hargrove further declared that "very few whites come into Criminal Court. It's fair to say that about 80 per cent of the crimes charged in this city are charged to blacks."

It is on this point that the opinions of Senator Welcome, Judge Hargrove and Mr. Lamb converge.

"We don't have time to play with numbers," Sen. Welcome declares. "These are people we're talking about. [illegible] which concern all of us."

One of the solutions to the problem as Judge Hargrove sees it, [illegible] the Community Correction Centers," which Mr. Lamb is charged with establishing in 18 communities around the city and even more around the state.

"These centers will be the best thing that ever happened to men coming out of prison," he says, "it's in the community where we must work to solve the problems of the community."

However, he concedes, "the problem is that people don't mind the concept of the centers; what they don't want is for them to be set up in their community. "But it is in the community where they begin their criminal training."

SUPERVISION

The community prison concept is not a new one says Sen. Welcome, "We've been working on it in the Legislature for a long time. People have to realize that when these men come out of prison they are coming back to those communities.

"It makes more sense to bring them back under gradual supervision with stabilizing forces in their lives than to just throw them out of prison and wait for them to come back."

The option to community corrections centers is, says, Sen. Welcome, "the big warehouse type prison that we've been trying to avoid building."

Several millions of dollars have been allocated for the Community Corrections centers and laments, Mr. Lamb, "if the community prison concept isn't accepted by the community and in some stages of operation here in the city by April, the money will be turned back; and the bigger prisons will be built.

REABSORBED

Essentially what the community prison does Judge Hargrove explains "[illegible] is allre a man, toward the end of his sentence to leave the prison environment and return to the community where he lives.

"He'll have a job and be under strict supervision; at the termination of his sentence he'll not only have a job and some security but the community will have reabsorbed him through several programs which will be set up in the center with participation of community groups."

However, everyone does not see the issue with the same enthusiasm. Del Walter R. Dean, Jr. is one of them. "I don't see how the program can benefit the black community. These men come from the black community and they will return to the black community, without the benefit of effective rehabilitation.

"There is nothing in the history of the Department of Correction to convince me that when they say they have so much money and they will assure strict supervision that they mean it, will be used for the black community."

De. Dean also questions the Task Force' statistics. "I question who did the research in the first place. You can be sure that it wasn't black people. So the point that I'm making is if they are so concerned with aiding blacks why don't they ever utilitze black expertise."

Moreover, Del. Dean insists, "for the past ten to twenty years we have put our faith in the man to deliver us the proper resources and he has never done so despite the many promises.

"The same is the case with the Correctional Centers. They will be established in black communities with the highest crime rate. They say that only men terminating their sentences will be allowed there. But if they haven't done anything to help the man during the five, ten years they spent in prison what can the community expect to receive?"

The task Force bills the centers as " a new direction in community crime reduction.' It also claims that the resident of the center will be a 'permanent addition to the tax base and will remove his family from the welfare rolls.' To all this Del. Dean answers:

"Absurd. They are building little prisons in black communities attached to the Department of Correction which has never performed for black people. And furthermore it's a hell of an assumption to make that all the black men in prison have families on welfare. That's a racist assumption and I contend that the centers are a racist concept."

"I don't think the cutback has any effect on services to those who need them," Mandel said.

"The Maryland program gives far more than what the other states give," the governor said, adding that the cutbacks would be permanent.

Like butter

Trained taste panelists at the Agricultural Research Service at the Dairy Products Laboratory, Washington, D.C., report they consistently prefer both the flavor and texture of cakes made with all butter.

Outside nursing homes and hospitals will pay 50 cents each for all prescription drugs they are now getting for free.

Also, podiatry padiatry patients will receive services limited to diagnostic and surgical procedures; vision patients over age 21 will be limited to one exam, and one pair of glasses every two years; and ambulance transportation for non-emergency treatment must have prior approval from the Health Department.

Kent said the program cutbacks will reduce the deficit by some $3.6 million and Gov. Mandel has agreed to submit a $8.5 million supplemental appropriation to the 1976 General Assembly.

The State Health Department plans to hold a public hearing on the cutbacks in December and has tentatively planned to place them in effect on Jan. 1.

Gov. Mandel said Thursday that Maryland Medicaid recipients will not be deprived of any services under new cutbacks announced Wednesday by the Medicaid administration.
