DOES ARTIFICIAL LIGHT INCREASE THE EGG YIELD?—CARE OF THE DEVELOPING PULLETS

Speaking of the use of lights to increase the egg yield in the short fall and winter days, the American Poultry Journal says:

"The point has been reached on the subject of artificial illumination for fowls to secure a heavier winter egg yield, where it is no longer necessary to convince poultrymen that such a thing is possible—it is accepted as a fact. I recall very plainly when this idea first began to be seriously discussed. It was then usually scouted by poultrymen and even by those at the head of their profession. It is amusing to see some of these gentlemen now among our most enthusiastic devotees of the theory of "more light, more eggs." We all get on to the wagon of progress sooner or later, or are left hopelessly behind.

"In the first flush of enthusiasm regarding the use of artificial lights on fowls to increase winter egg production, it was predicted, and often positively asserted, that this method was revolutionary—that lights solved every vexing problem concerning the securing of eggs during the cold months when hens had been in the habit of taking a long siesta. Perhaps no one could be blamed in those first years for feeling that they "had the world by the tail," so to speak, and that, defying Mother Nature, we had the elements, the seasons and the hens at our mercy. As their first enthusiasm began to cool, and clear-headed poultrymen saw that lights, far from being an open sesame to the riches of bushels of eggs at $1 per dozen, could turn and bite the hand that used them, gradually the idea began to take form that perhaps the use of an electric light bulb in a hen house in the middle of the night did not solve poultry problems, nor that there were no attendant risks.

"Experimental stations, as well as commercial poultrymen have come to a number of definite conclusions concerning the use of artificial lights in connection with poultry. They may be classed roughly as follows:

"That their use may be the cause of direct loss rather than a gain in the production of winter eggs.

"That there are wrong and right ways of using lights.

That their use and proper application must be thoroughly understood before definite and permanently successful results may be obtained.

"That lights may either strengthen or weaken the stamina of a flock.

"That hens under lights must be fed in a definite way before a satisfactory egg can be secured.

"That the heavy winter production has a tendency to lower the spring yield, but not in all cases.

"That lights have the tendency to increase the yearly egg yield, but not in all cases by any means.

"That lights may be used in connection with other classes of poultry, besides layers, with satisfactory results."

So, there you are, in brief, without any review. According to this leading poultry journal, you do and you don't get more eggs with lights.

Many of our Kent county poultry raisers now find the early pullets laying or showing indications of commencing egg production. Their singing, the reddening of the combs and the frequent explorations of the nest boxes are all indications of getting down to business. But these indications alone are not sufficient to insure a full egg basket the coming winter. The maturing pullets must be carefully handled lest they be given a setback. One can make or mar a good winter layer or promising pullet at this time. Too many are too prone to neglect them now, when attaining good size and apparently able to look out for themselves. The good feed and care that was given them when small is lacking now—the early enthusiasm is gone. This is where we make a grave mistake. Good care is now essential. The pullets should be put in their winter quarters not later than the latter part of October or the first of November. The pullets should be thoroughly settled in their winter home before the cold weather sets in. Some times we put an early, laying pullet in the winter quarter during cold weather and laying is not resumed until spring. We must also exercise care in feeding the maturing pullets and give them all they can eat of good, wholesome, palatable, laying mash and good grains. Care of a flock of poultry always pays—no matter whether it be in winter or in summer.

SACHS' SERVICE SHOE STORE

To Give You Good Telephone Service

TELEPHONE employees have only one aim in their work—to give you good and continuous telephone service.

They are willing to make, and do make, sacrifices and suffer personal inconvenience that you might be satisfactorily served.

Every time a fire, storm or flood puts the service of a town in danger the telephone men are on the job, be it day or night, to keep the service going. And they don't object to long hours under disagreeable conditions.

The operators, too, are ever watchful to serve you at all hours and to give you prompt and accurate connections. They, too, do not hesitate to work hard and long when public service demands it.

Our engineering force is constantly studying ways and means to improve the service and equipment, while our office employees do everything in their power to make pleasant your transactions with the telephone company.

In short, all the telephone people—from the executives down to the newest clerks—have before them always the ideal of service.

We do not claim to be perfect, however, and probably there are times when you have some criticism to make of the service or equipment.

At such times we will consider it a favor if you will notify us immediately. It is our pleasure to serve you.
