WASHINGTON COLLEGE

At the last meeting of the Adelphia Literary Society, on Nov. 10, Dr. C. P. Gould gave a little talk on his early literary society days. He was a member of the Bancroft Literary Society when he attended the Baltimore City College. During those days literary societies of that institution were as full of intrigue and politics as the national capital is today. Dr. Gould, being one of the few who knew parliamentary law, was an important factor in those activities. In fact, he was the center of his own little political circle; he was a political boss. He spoke of those activities with a great relish, common in most people who discuss "those good old days." It is doubtful whether Dr. Gould intended to [illegible]alize in any way, but a moral ma[illegible] drawn from his speech. If his li[illegible]y society had any effect on his lat[illegible]eer, it was for the best. The qualit[illegible]of leadership in a man, if he has a[illegible]at all, should be developed in youth[illegible] There is no better place for that than the literary society. In the case of Dr. Gould it seems that he took advantage of that opportunity. The remainder of the week was very uneventful. Since the students were granted a holiday on Armistice Day, many went home. On that account both a dance by the Campus Club and a football game between old and new men, scheduled for Saturday, had to be postponed.

Bold Attempt To Steal Dog

While Messrs. George and Kent Lambert were rabbit hunting in the woods near their home one day this week, an automobile, driven by a stranger, passed into the wood, and when Messrs. Lamberts' dog crossed the ravine where he was standing, the man boldly called the dog, put him in his car and made for the Rock Hall ferry. The Lambert brothers, upon missing their dog, and having heard the car drive up, immediately surmised what had taken place and ran for their home to head the man oc and get their car, if necessary and pursue him. They noticed the direction the car had taken and immediately set out to run him down. Pursuer and pursued thundered on toward Rock Hall and the ferry, but the man who had taken the dog was unable to go further upon reaching the bay shore and was compelled to give up his stollen "booty." The stealing of dogs has become a common practice in this section and some drastic measure should be taken against these thieves that will set an example to others and put a stop to the same.
