looked wildly about for a place to hide, and just as the door swung open he dropped out of sight behind the largest of the trunks, where he could see without being seen.

The newcomer was a girl; any competent judge of girls would tell you that she was a very lovely girl. But her loveliness alone was hardly sufficient for the gasp which the man behind the trunk gave on seeing her.

She went to the same dormer which he had occupied and stood looking out the window for some time. Then, he had done, she spoke:

"I don't care!" she announced aloud. "If he wants to go off and sulk all day, let him! Just because he thinks I'm going riding with Peter Westbrook! I—I d-don't care!"
