Losses By Hog Cholera Big In State

Hog cholera cost the farmers of Maryland in direct losses more than $68,000 in 1922, according to estimates of Dr. I. K. Atherton, inspector in charge of hog cholera work in Maryland, who argues that the disease will continue to take a heavy annual toll until the idea gains headway that it can be prevented more easily and cheaply than it can be controlled after it starts. He shows in his annual report that there were 589 outbreaks of the disease in 1922 compared with 458 in 1921. Sixty per cent, or 354, of the total number of outbreaks were classed as primary or new outbreaks. The other forty per cent, or 235, were classed as secondary and had spread from primary outbreaks.
