It is a harmful and costly practice to permit little chickens to get wet and cold. Clean, warm, dry quarters are indispensable.

It is a mistake to feed sour or tainted food. All mash or soft food that is not eaten up an hour after feeding should be gathered up and thrown away.

The best method of combating contagious diseases is to dispose of the sick fowls and disinfect the premises thoroughly.

Let the fowls have all the exercise possible to keep their digestive organs working.

The slightest ailment should be treated as promptly as a contagious disease.

A mixture of white and brown shelled eggs in the incubator will give an unsatisfactory hatch.

Never overfeed the young chicks; feed a little and often; keep them satisfied but not overfed.

Good, thick buttermilk is about as good as green bone to make the chicks grow and the hens lay.

Foul air and filth will furnish shelter for contagion.
