17-YEAR LOCUSTS DUE THIS YEAR

Kent County Will Be Infested For A A Week Or So, It Is Said

This is a 17-year locust year. In fifteen states east of the Mississippi these remarkable insects, more properly known as the periodical cicades, will emerge from their underground homes which they have inhabited for 17 years, and the males will fill the woods with their shrill love songs. The females are dumb. The first cicades may be expected to appear above the ground at any time now, says a scientific magazine.

The States in which they will be heard and seen this year are Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Ohia, Pennsylvania, W. Virginia and the District of Columbia. Not all parts of the states mentioned will be affected, the distribution of the cicades being decidedly local.

Periodical cicades appear somewhere within the range of their general distribution nearly every year. This is in agreement, however, with their periodical character, as it has been found that they all belong to swarms which reappear every 13 or 17 years. More than one swarm may inhabit a given territory, causing an apparent return of the most widely distributed. This year's swarm is of the true 17-year variety. It is probably the second largest of all the swarms, and one of th most widely distributed.

Church Hill Man Holds Record

Although the appointment of Luther H. Gadd, 80 years old, as clerk of the Court of Appeals at Annapolis, establishes a precedent so far as age at the time of acceptance is concerned, officials at the Court House in Baltimore are unwilling to yield the palm to Annapolis for the oldest public esrvant in Maryland. Mr. S. H. Crane, 81 years old, formerly of Church Hill, bailiff to Judge Eli Frank, is Baltimore's candidate for this distinction, he being 82 years old. He was formerly a Church Hill man.

The Fourth In Kent County

The Fourth of July was celebrated in Kent county in the usual quiet manner, with a liberal outpouring of autos on their way to our resorts on the bay and various shores along the Chester. Until late in the afternoon, the day was an ideal one, after a most dreary outlook in the morning, which for a time held the automobilists in check. But, finally, Old Sol broke its way through the cloud-screen and shone its brightest being the signal for an outpouring of autos, which soon almost choked the main arteries of travel and overflowed to the peaceful byways for safer travel when possible to do so.

Prohibition In Queen Anne's

Four Queen Anne's countians were arrested, two complete stills were destroyed, approximately 80 gallons of mash were discovered and about 25 quarts of contraband whiskey were confiscated, as the result of a county-wide investigation and raid conducted last week by James H. Bratten, National Prohibition Officer, of the Customs House, Baltimore, assisted by Constable John P. Williamson, of Centreville. One prisoner was carried to Baltimore to be given a hearing in the U. S. District Court, and another will appear there for trial shortly after.

Mrs. Emma L. Crouch, beloved wife of James L. Crouch, died at her home in Baltimore on July 2, 1923, age about 60 years. Her remains were brought to the home of her brother, George W. Noblette, of Worton. The funeral services were held at 3 o'clock on July 4, Rev. Simms in charge. The pall bearers were Perry B. Raisin, C. B. Storke, Bennie Herbert, William Noblette, John H. Skeggs and Frank Holdson. Interment in Union cemetery. B. R. Fellows, undertaker.

Items Of Interest That Will Interest Our Readers Who Are Interested In The Thrill of Competition

Johnson and Flowers are batting well in the Shore League and Cambridge bids fair to make the other circuit teams hustle to win the pennant.

Do boxing and baseball mix? Have they a place in common and is that place the huge concrete structures which have been reared for the purpose of the perpetuation of baseball. These questions are being discussed pro and con, at some length, in the newspapers.

The interest in baseball down the Peninsula was probably never greater than at present, due to the close race in the Eastern Shore League. Many fans from Chestertown, Centreville and others Shore towns are present at the contests, especially when played at Dover, Del., which is the closest town to Chestertown.

Milford has gone into last place in the Eastern Shore League because of a decision handed against them by the president of the league. It seems that the town had more "class" players than were allowed on their team, and although they were at the head of the list, the decision against them relegated them to last place, because they were required to forfeit a great many contests.

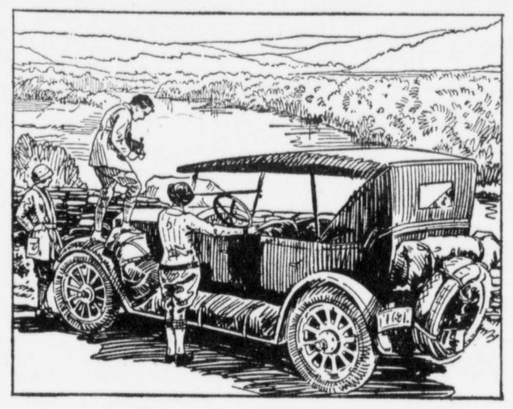

VIRGINIA WHEAT COSTS

Figures Show Cost to Raise Crop to Be About Same as Mrs. Evelyn Harris' Estimates

It cost the Valley of Virginia farmer between $25 and $26 per acre to grow wheat, which is approximately the same that it costs the Maryland farmer, according to Mrs. Evelyn Harris' compilation. This is about $10 per acre higher than the per-acre costs of the Kansas farmer, as given by President Harding.

The estimates of wheat costs in the Valley of Virginia, which is an important wheat belt and which produces two-fifths of the crop in Virginia, were obtained in two widely separated counties—one in Rockinham county, in the southern end of the valley, and the other in Clark, in the northern end of the Valley.

The Valley farmer got from $1 to $1.35 for his wheat last year, and he figures he lost from $3.50 to $10 an acre, according to yield and price, or a statewide average loss between $5 and $6 per acre.
