Pulling no punches: a Schaefer interview

Part II

Governor William Donald Schaefer

By Roz Hamlett
AFRO Staff Writer

ANNAPOLIS — Question: Did the 1987 General Assembly give you a break, governor?"

"No, they didn't do me any great favors," said Gov. William Donald Schaefer during a recent interview. In Schaefer's mind, he got what he wanted because what he wanted was good.

By most accounts, the 90-day session, which ended this week, was a huge success for all. Most of the governor's major initiatives won approval. The legislature, however, he has acquired a new understanding of the legislature and how to get things done.

But the governor wants more power to do the job. In his estimation, the former Gov. Harry Hughes is largely responsible for stripping the executive branch of its executive prerogatives, exclusive rights and privileges that Schaefer said he has had difficulty in taking back.

But today the governor appears pleased with the progress made, although he was forced to make concessions in major portions of his agenda. Legislators rejected his plan to keep two-thirds of the windfall tax to fund social programs for the state's most indigent. Instead, two-thirds of the $180 million will be returned to low-income families.

Schaefer insists the programs were right. "I wanted to help the poor. Now what were they going to do, cut me off at the knees if I stood up and said I wanted to help the poor?" he

Schaefer gave a much needed shot in the arm to flagging black business when he approved a measure that authorizes that minority participation in the stadium project through goals designed to guarantee set percentages.

Question: But how will these goals be enforced so that they translate into reality, governor?

Schaefer responded with one word—"desire." "There must be

NAACP denounces racism in lending

By China Myers
AFRO Staff Writer

"The presence or absence of housing loans can make or break a neighborhood," according to Dr. Anne Shlay in a report for the Maryland Alliance for Responsible Investment (MARI). Dr. Shlay, of Johns Hopkins University, compared the effect that area banks have on housing loans and found bias directed towards blacks.

The local NAACP announced Wednesday that the results of the MARI survey for lending patterns in the Baltimore area show Advance Federal Savings and Loan Association is ranked No. 1 in fairness and equity in lending.

Advance Federal, a black owned savings and loan bank, has been operating in the Baltimore area since 1957.

Its performance has been relatively small in volume compared to other banking institutions, but highly profitable, according to W.O. Bryson, president.

George Buntin, executive secretary for the Baltimore NAACP, said, "Banks have been redlining against black organizations for years. Advance Federal

Constant Care Medical Center gets extension; Dr. Webb resigns

Constant Care Medical Center received an extension until April 30 by the state insurance commissioner who had threatened to close the health maintenance organization unless it raised approximately $400,000 in equity to remedy its impairment.

The extension was achieved at a price. Long term executive director Dr. Harvey Webb resigned midnight Tuesday saying, "It is perceived that I am an issue and so I removed myself as an issue. Constant Care is much more important to the community than one individual."

That same night the Constant Care Community Health Center Board of Directors appointed Gregory James Williams as Acting Executive Director of Constant Care, effective immediately, following the surprise resignation of Dr. Harvey Webb, Jr.

Dr. Webb announced his decision at a meeting of the Board of Directors held on the eve of an April 15 deadline set by the Maryland State Insurance Commissioner for Constant Care to establish an equity reserve of $350,000.

To date, Constant Care has not made sufficient progress to acquire this equity, although help has been sought from many sources. These circumstances led Dr. Webb and the Board to conclude that Constant Care was no longer being perceived as a broadbased, community - oriented institution when in fact, that is exactly what it is.

Constant Care's programs were all initiated to meet documented community needs. Health care in Constant Care's service area is enhanced by special services which address major community problems such as teen pregnancy, alcoholism, unemployment, and lack of basic health education.

The hallmark of Constant Care's health care delivery style according to center officials is to treat its patients with warmth, yet respect, against the background of their community experience. "Constant Care is a unique entity;" said Dr. Webb. "It has programs that no other institution has, and it serves its patients well."

Dr. Webb continued, "the importance of preserving Constant Care transcends the individual

Ching Olazo, Red Cross lab technologist, is testing a donor's blood serum for HTLV3, more commonly known as the AIDS virus.

Red Cross efforts ensure safe blood supply

By Paula J. Wagner
AFRO Staff Writer

Ching Olazo claps the pipettor and is careful to add a blood donor's serum to the antigen, a small red bead, that lies inside individual wells of the Elisa testing tray. The tray sits in front of her in a lab at the Red Cross on Charles Street.

Mrs. Olazo is a lab technologist. Her job is to test a donor's blood sample for the presence of HTLV3, commonly known as the AIDS virus.

Since March, 1985, when the Elisa or AIDS test, was approved by the Food and Drug Administration, the American Red Cross has been scrutinizing donors and blood donations to insure a faultless AIDS test and to make certain that those in need of the vital blood substance were not at risk in transmitting the disease.

Blood samples of each donor are tested. First, the serum is diluted and is then added to a small red bead that is coded with the viral antigen, according to Michelle Hunt of the American Red Cross.

The complete test is seven to eight hours long and involves several hours of incubation. If the HTLV3 is present in the serum, it will attach itself to the red bead, which will be demonstrated by a change of color, explained Ching Olazo.

Textbook shortages create nationwide problems for students

WASHINGTON (UPI) — As Education Secretary William Bennett steps up the pace of his march down the road to excellence in schools, educators are being primed to correct a major flaw in the road - the textbooks.

For years, many of the nation's schools have battled problems with textbook shortages or outdated material. Even today students in some low-income areas either are not allowed to take textbooks out of the school building or find that the one brought home is either obsolete or different from the one being used in class.

Students in a history class in one Mississippi district continued to carry texts proclaiming Richard M. Nixon as the last president while the presidency of President Reagan was beginning to reel from the Iran arms-Contra aid controversy.

With the supply problem, homework for teachers in money-tight school districts often means long, tedious hours dittoing pages from precious few textbooks. For the children, crumpled, finger-smeared paper has replaced the traditional hardbound illustrated textbooks.

"People are really starting to look at textbooks," especially since Bennett has begun his "education excellence" campaign, said Donald Eklund, vice president of the school division of the Association for American Publishers.

The association said $1.6 billion was spent on school textbooks across the nation last year, less than 1 cent out of every education dollar.

The National Education Association said the average amount spent per pupil in the 1985-86 school year was $3,723 - $33 or $34 for textbooks.

"When you stop and consider, if you are investing $3,700 to educate a child and not providing them with the tools, the return on that investment would be much greater if the teacher has all the tools to work with that child," Eklund said.

In 1985, the top five states spending the most per pupil for textbooks were the District of Columbia, $57.72; New Mexico, $52.44; South Dakota, $47.99; Alaska, $46.65; Wyoming, $44.10. Alabama ranked last with an expenditure of $19.29 and Idaho was next to last at $21.50.

The problem of inadequate or outdated textbooks is complex.

Eklund said many areas fail to specifically budget for textbooks and find that they often are faced with the choice of updating textbooks or paying that fuel bill when the area is hit by a severe winter.

Other districts may decide to delay updating textbooks so the money can be used for a more favored project.

Most school districts complain of tight budgets and many of them use fundraising activities for extra money. But in low-income areas, there is little extra money to be collected.

Supplying each child with a textbook also has been shunned in some areas because of past experiences of abuse or losses.

"School districts don't like to admit they have textbook shortages because parents will feel the students are not getting an adequate education," said Scott Treibitz of the American Federation of Teachers.

"By not having enough textbooks, it not only increases the burden on teachers but decreases the quality of instruction," said Treibitz.

Carol Thomas of the Detroit Federation of Teachers said the policy is that all elementary and most middle school children cannot take textbooks home because of the limited number of books. However, the school board has a homework policy, whereby teachers coordinate out-of-classroom work.

"Teachers here do a lot of dittoing," said Thomas. "What each school is suppose to have is a ditto machine and to go with that machine, you have to have paper and fluid. Right now they are out of fluid and paper in the warehouse because the board did not budget sufficiently.
