Poultry Notes

CONTINUED RAINS IN KENT HAVE KILLED MANY CHICKS—OTHER NOTES

The past month has been very discouraging to many chick raisers in Kent, because of the continued rains, which have wet their coops and caused chick ills of many kinds, this is the result of not being prepared to rear the young properly. Such weather conditions always slow up the poultry industry at this season, especially the baby chick section. But reports from the country over, judging from 135 replies to a questionaire from the Baby Chick Association, give conditions as normal or above, with the exceptions of Illinois and Ohio. Nearly 50 per cent more chicks have been produced this year than last.

This is a practical age, and this is an intensely practical country. Do your birds do well as they look well If they do you are one of the elect. But if they can't make good at the nest as well as look pretty on the lawn, you better reorganize your business.

Beware the slim shanks and the knock-knees! Look well to the build of your youngsters. If you were building a house you would be very particular about the points of strength—you would insist on strong braces, immovable foundations, walls that will resist any kind of weather. Practice the same caution in the building of your flock for next year.

With the single exception of the "pip," "gapes" are probably the oldest recognized poultry affliction and considering their universal distribution and the mortality they are responsible for and the distressing symptoms their victims display, we are surprised that we find them so infrequently referred to in poultry disease columns of the poultry press and text books on poultry. The gape worm has been known and written about for over a hundred years.

An important proposition is this one of culling and killing the hens that are two years old or older. There is no doubt that many make a mistake by keeping hens until they are too old to earn even their living—much less help you earn yours. Old hens are like old horses to some of us. We get to loving them for what they have done.

..Any flock will get into the habit of eating eggs now and then. It usually begins with one hen, and there may be several causes. If a bird gets too hungry she will resort to extreme measures, just as you would. Men have been known to eat each other in order to save their lives. A hen is very ravenous sort of animal—if she is any good. Hunger, therefore, may drive them to eating eggs. Lack of oyster shells may mean that the egg shells are too thin, and the result is a broken egg.

Many Kent farm women are setting their hens by the score and will rear some nice chicks. The season has been late and May and June chicks will be in demand.

During the warm weather of summer, growing chicks must have shade to which they can retreat during the heat of the day, if they areto make a satisfactory growth and remain normal and healthy in their development. While free range and green food are the primary essentials on the range, the need for shade must not be overlooked or neglected. Too much shade is a disadvantage in that sufficient areas will not be available for the growing of green grass and green feed of various kinds. For that reason, where chicks are reared in woodland, open spaces should be cleared away and seeded down to permanent sod. Most poultry ranges are out in the open fields with no natural shade avail able so that plans must be made right now to take care of this important problem, during the summer.
