Your Health

THE "COOTY"

PARASITES are present everywhere in vegetable life, like the mistletoe upon the oak and the beautiful orchid, but not all are so attractive as these.

They are equally prevalent in animal life—in fact it seems to be nature's plan to give every animal and plant some kind of an enemy to furnish a good excuse for the struggle for existence and the maintenance of the species.

In man there are twice as many varieties of parasites as in any other animal.

Of the parasites in human beings there are more than fifty varieties, some living on the outside of the body, others in the intestines, muscles, eyes, liver and elsewhere.

Three-quarters of the human parasites are on the skin or in the intestines.

The "cooty," or body louse, is of very great importance, not only because of the annoyance he gives his hosts, but because he may carry the germ of spotted or typhus fever.

This disease was widespread and deadly in the early part of the war; and when Serbian soldiers were captured by Germans, the first thing done for them was to round them up and entlauesen, that is, un-lice, them.

Lice live and propagate in the hairy parts of the skin—particularly on the hair of the scalp, but also on the eyebrows, eyelashes, beard, armpits and elsewhere.

They seem to prefer the hair on the back of the head. One variety makes its home in the seams of the clothing, but migrates to the skin when hungry.

The eggs, or nits, attach themselves to hairs, and it is very difficult to dislodge them.

They are small, white, globular bodies near the root of the hair or at any point along its shaft.

In the careless and neglected, they are found in the midst of dirty and matted hair, mingled with pus, scabs and other evidences of inflammation. The sexes of lice are distinct, and there are separate varieties for different parts of the body.

They fasten themselves to the skin with their hooklets, and when feeding thrust their nose into the skin, like the mosquito, and withdraw blood.

The female lays 50 to 60 eggs which she glues to the hair with a very tenacious secretion from her body.

The itching and scratching they excite cause inflammation and suppuration, and the pus in the neglected cases produces the matting of the hair and general filthiness.

An eruption like eczema may be produced and there may be swelling and soreness in the glands of the armpit, groin and neck.

The parasites and their eggs may be destroyed by a soap, or lotion, or bath containing sulphur, tobacco or mercury. Crude petroleum or kerosene, alone or mixed with sweet oil or balsam of Peru (to destroy the odor), is effective, as also is an infusion of the flowers of larkspur or the fluid extract of the seeds.

Unless these preparations are used thoroughly, and both lice and eggs destroyed, the result will be disappointing!

It is often desirable to destroy the eggs by themselves after the lice have been destroyed; and for this purpose strong preparations of soda, vinegar, borax or alcohol may be used.

They must be applied liberally and thoroughly, in order to dissolve the material which fastens the egg to the hair.

As the clothing of those who have vermin upon the body is also infested, in very many cases, it is well to submit it for a sufficient length of time to the vapor of formaldehyde, or to live steam.

THE WHY of SUPERSTITIONS
By H. IRVING KING

THE GOLDENROD

IN NEW ENGLAND, and perhaps in other parts of the country, a gall from the stem of a goldenrod (caused by the sting of an insect) is called a "rheumaty-bud." Each gall contains a small white grub and the belief is that as long as the grub remains alive one who carries the gall in his pocket will be free from rheumatism.

The efficacy of this cure—or rather preventive—is based upon the fact that the flower of the plant from which the gall is picked is of a bright golden color—the color of the sun and therefore connected with the sun-god, Apollo. Apollo did not exactly represent the sun itself but rather the light and life-giving influences of the sun. And also he was a great "protector."

The part which the grub in the gall plays in this piece of folk-medicine is based upon an idea of primitive man concerning the grubs and maggots which appeared in the galls of trees and plants and in decaying animal matter. They were supposed to be in a peculiar manner an embodiment of the spirit of the substance in which they were engendered—to have sprung from and been created by the vital essence of that substance. In the customs of many savage tribes today this primitive idea is found surviving in full force with regard to the worms found in dead bodies and gives rise to disgusting rites by which the living seek to acquire the courage, or other desirable qualities of the dead.

Thus it will be seen that a grub engendered in the golden plant of Apollo might well be supposed to be efficacious in warding off disease. As long as it lives it lives with the life of the sun-god.
