NURSE IN THE SCHOOLS

PUBLIC OFFICIAL DOING GOOD WORK AMONG KENT CHILDREN

Recent scientific studies have shown that the sturdy, healthy child makes the best all-round student. It is therefore, good economy for Boards of Education, as well as individuals, to take all possible measures to safeguard the work of the public health nurse.

Asked to outline the work of the nurses in the schools, Miss C. Ethel Monroe, Advisory Nurse for the State Department of Health, said the school work, like all other public health activities in the counties, is directed by the Deputy State Health Officer. Under his direction, the nurse visits each school in her district, and makes a preliminary inspection of the children to be examined, preparatory to the examination to be given by the doctor. In this inspection, each child is weighed and measured, and his hearing and vision are tested. The nurse looks for the scar of a successful vaccination against smallpox, and inspects the child's scalp for vermin. A card which serves as a permanent health record, is made out for each child, giving name, age, home address, name of parent or guardian, and the results of the test.

When the health officer, or the doctor who is acting for him, visits the school to make the physical examination of the children, the nurse is present to assist. If conferences are arranged between the health officer and the parents of the children who are found to have physical defects, the nurse is present at these conferences. Her most important duty however, is found in the follow-up visits to the homes of these children, where she urges the parents to take the necessary steps for the correction of the defects found. If an operation is recommended by the family physician (to whom the health officer invariably refers the child needing care), the nurse helps to make the necessary arrangements for the child's hospitalization. It will be interesting to note that a very large part of the work done by the nurses during the past summer, has been among the children, the nurses trying to get them in good physical condition to start the school year.

"The nurse's duties in the school do not end with this. Of equal importance is the work she is called upon to do in assisting in the control of communicable diseases. When an outbreak threatens, with the approval of the school authorities, and under the direction of the Deputy State Health Officer, she visits the school each day, and inspects the children, sending home those who present suspicious symptons, recommending that the parents place these children under the supervision of their family physicians. She follows this up by visits to the homes to explain the reasons for the action taken, and to enlist the cooperation of the members of the various households in carrying out the precautions against the spread of the disease recommended by the State Department of Health.

In addition, the nurse often gives assistance to the teachers in their classroom work on health, providing them with suitable literature, and other material. Very often too, her work includes courses in home hygiene and care of the sick these courses usually being given to the high school girls.

"Owing to the distances that many of the nurses are required to cover, it is not possible for them to carry on all of these activities in detail, in additon to their other work, the above however, is the general plan recommended.

DR. PERRY CHATS WITH THE KING OF BAGDAD

On a boat ride in the course of his recent trip abroad Dr. Perry, field vice-president of Washington College met King Fiescal of Bagdad who played such an important and picturesque role at the Paris Peace Conference, held at Versailles after the great war. At that time Fiescal had not been elevated to his present lofty post of power but was merely the representative and spokesman of his people. Owing to their strategic position in proximity to the great oil fields of Mesopotamia for the possession of which England and Turkey to say nothing of other world powers are now at grips, Fiescal's people suddenly loomed up as an important factor in the peace settlement. Consequently the King, elected to office after the peace, and his present visit to London are occupying a large place in the English public mind and in the London press.

Says Dr. Perry, "The King of Baddad! The name reminds one of Douglas Fairbanks, the Arabian Nights and childhood fancies. Today we call him the King of Irak or Iraq and he is in the limelight for the Mosul oil fields are involved. And to think that the humble vice-president of an humble college knows this great man! We have been with him this last summer and learned much about the Mosul oil fields. Some things we must not divulge.

It chanced in this way; we were booked to sail from Alexandria, Egypt, direct to Marseilles. We saw in a Cairo paper that His Majesty, King Fiescal of Iraq was listed incognito among the passengers. Gossip had it that he was on his way to London for medical treatment. On board we were introduced to him and from the beginning felt at home with him. He is 37 years old, has a French beard, light gray hair, weighs about 150 pounds and has a most pleasing manner. With him was his secretary and his private secretary. He speaks English fairly well but hesitated to use the language, fearing he would not be correct. I tried one evening to get him to play dominoes but again he begged to be excused. One day he very generously consented to sign his name on our many travel note books and humorously tried to teach my youngest member, a sweet girl seven years of age, the proper way to write his name. Our second day out, at the dinner hour, our boat stopped. He arose from his table near us and left the dining salon. No one surmised the meaning of it all but after dinner we learned the steerage had had a funeral and that as the body was lowered into the deep blue, the King has placed a wreath of flowers on it.

One evening while I was in conversation with him a little girl came up from the steerage; made her way into our parlor; knelt before the King; kissed his hand and presented a note. He took it, beckoned her to stand; called his secretary and evidently granted the request coming from this little child. We talked of the oil fields in old Mesopotamia; the home of our old friend Abraham. We talked of the conflict between the Turks and British and were I to expose his statements they would make a big headliner for any metropolitan daily. Suffice it to say that there are unlimited financial possibilities between those ancient rivers, the Tigris and the Euphrates. Here my friend the King rules over three million subjects. He kindly objected to being called "king." "I am," he said, "only a sheik" but we insisted and he did not protest.

Altho the king was traveling incognito he was received with pomp and cameras in abundance as he landed on the French shores. He hurried to London. Some London papers say he came for medical treatments while others gave a political interpretation to his visit. At all events since his arrival in London town the newspapers have been astir and Turkey is active. We shall watch our king and we wish him well."
