QUARANTINE AND THE WAGE-EARNER

When a case of diphtheria or of scarlet fever or of small-pox or one of the other communicable diseases is being cared for in a household, are the other members of the family—with the exception of course, of those engaged in nursing the patient—especially the school children and the wage—earning grown-ups. permitted to come and go, as usual, to school or business?

Replying to this question, Dr. R. H. Riley, Chief of the Bureau of Communicable Disease of the State Department of Health said "the State reputations concerning the isolation or quarantine of persons suffering from a communicable disease, and the freedom allowed the members of the household, have been enacted purely for the purpose of preventing the spread of disease. The regulations differ in regard to different disease, if a case of small-pox is being cared for, the regulations of the State Board of Health require what we call complete isolation not only of the patient, but of all members of the household. The premises are placarded and no person except the Health Officer. the physician or the Public Health Nurse in attendance upon the patient may leave the house until the quarantine is lifted.
