The Snail.

(W. K. Seymour, in New Witness.)

Veined and lustrous, ringed with pearl and azure.
With amber flecked, and orange and black,
Marvelous is the house of his abiding.
The curved, frail mansion on his glistening back.

Trekkling from clump to clump of yellowing grasses,
On yielding mounds of pale, wind-patterned sand,
He leaves a path of silver as the night falls
And the gray twilight wavers from the land.

Then the salt spray from seaward, the moon shining
Through crystalline beads of dew and root and stem;
Beetles and worms and fluttering moths and spiders,
Blind, thrusting moles and blind bats over them.

He goes his way, with quivering horns advancing
To green, alluring grasses, gravely intent
Shrinking when rabbits scurry past to warren
And foxes slide by with careless scent.

Dawn shows an oasis of grass and nettles;
In viscous joy he feeds and climbs and clings,
His house is ringed with azure, pearl and amber,
Perched high in leafage where the young sap sings.
