POULTRY NOTES

NOTES THAT WILL HELP OUR READERS WITH THEIR POULTRY PROBLEMS

Did you ever hear it said that you must send North and East for high class Breeders? Did you ever hear some one say that the climate of the North and East was more ideal for the producing of high class breeders for both show birds and layers? Yes, I have, and quite often, for it seems to be a wide spread delusion throughout the South and Southwest.

There is just one absolutely sure way to judge pullets for egg production. You can tell the good from the bad by proper culling and selection. The trap-nest tells the story without any alibi. To depend on any known system is to fail in some cases. You take no chance when the trap-nest tells you that your pullets are good layers. The difference between success and failure in the poultry business may be just the information secured in this way. Can you afford to take chances of breeding from the wrong kind of birds

It is a wonderful thing to catch the "hen fever." It is even more wonderful if you catch it in a chronic form which makes you want not only to keep some chickens but to make you want them to keep you! If you catch it in the latter form, you will begin to develop a chronic thirst—for knowledge, which may be obtained through the poultry journals, poultry schools, experienced friends, and in other ways. You will also have a desire to do things right, developing the business as your knowledge increases and you have a good chance to succeed. If you catch the disease in another form, you will be afflicted with wild dreams to the effect that fine houses adorned with fancy gingerbread fixtures that appeal to your fancy as 'Fixins' although they are of supreme indifference to Biddy and will play no part in your future success, although they often help to write up another failure. The country is full of memorials to the disease in this form. Each of these failures can be traced to one vialte fundamental which was lacking—knowledge of the business. START RIGHT!

"THERE IS NO MONEY IN THE CHICKEN BUSINESS" consider well—is it the fault of the business of the individual? Others have made a success, what is the trouble here? This efficiency test, will usually plaec the blame in it's proper place.

Decide on the purpose for which your pullets are being raised, whether for exhibition, market egg production, future breeders' etc., and then hatch at the proper time to bring them to maturity for best results for that purpose. Retarded development has been proven impractical. It is far better to hatch at the proper time so that full feeding can be practiced, rather than to attempt to hold them back.

Many poultrymen make the mistake of feeding too small an amount of grain to their pullets. Consequently they lose flesh, which eventually makes them stop laying and take a false molt which could have been avoided if preventitive measures had been taken in time. Handle your pullets, note their weight, if necessary by means of scales until you become expert in judging them without. See that they are holding their own, unless you want them to quit laying and take a rest, often going into a molt.

If you are catering to commercial eggs only, then you do not need male birds. Infertile eggs keep better and sell better in some markets. It costs over $2.00 to feed a male bird for a year, therefore, it will pay you better to keep an extra hen.

Mate one male with about ten females of the larger breeds. Use one male to fourteen or fifteen females if you have one of the smaller breeds. If the birds are out on free range you can use one male to twenty or thirty females. Remember that the pullets of the larger breeds that are hatched in February, March and April make your early fall layers and winners. Also the early hatched cockerels bring good prices as broilers.

Eggs saved for hatching should be stored in cases, small end down, air cell on top as there is less chance for the yolk to adhere to the inner membrane. See that they are not subjected to high or low temperatures. Keep in a moderately warm place where the temperature does not drop below 50 degrees nor go above 70 degrees. For best results do not keep eggs for hatching over ten days. Good hatches are sometimes obtained from eggs older than this, but they are the exception. Follow a safe rule and set your eggs as fresh as possible. It pays—not only in numbers of chicks but in added size and vigor of the chicks.

If you are saving eggs for hatching, don't allow them to remain in the nest long enough to become chilled. Select only eggs that have good shell texture, uniform in size, shape and color, and only such eggs as you know come from birds that have made good records, birds of deep bodies, broad backs, bright eyes, large combs, birds that are full of vim and vigor.
