South Wind

The wind is to the South'ard
And the low hung atmosphere,
Makes distant sounds seem clearer
While excitement hovers near.

The day is wooing nature
While the dampness is so close;
The breeze is tinged with sadness,
But its tone is not morose.

For wind so soft and plaintive
Makes one burst into a song
Of things that never happen
But of those for which we long.

And now the rain that follows
Will wash our song away:
Elated, and refreshed we
Turn to thoughts of every day.

The Blue Bird

"Trually, tru-al-ly, tru-al-ly"
What are you telling me
"Re-al-ly, re-al-ly, re-al-ly"
'Tis Springs Bluebird I see.

"Trually, trually, trually"
Winter has gone at last
"Really, really, really"
The days are lengthening fast.

No more today, do I hear the bird
He's gone to my neighbors tree
To show her his new Spring Coat of blue,
And, tell her I hope, of me.

"Trually, trually, trually"
Nature is ready for Spring
"Really, really, really"
Thus does the Bluebird sing.

"Trually, trually, trually"
My mate is calling to me.
"Really, really, really"
My love is waiting for me.

CIRCUIT COURT NEWS.

OSCAR WARWICK SENTENCED TO THREE YEARS IN PENITENTIARY OTHER NOTES

In the case of State vs. John Parks and Ethel Parks Friday last for maintaining public nuisance. Two presentments. Plead not guilty. Fined $50 and costs for each offense or 60 days in jail.

The court adjourned for Saturday.

On Monday morning the case of State vs. Oscar Warwick, for second degree murder, was brought up for trial. The state was represented by States Attorney S. Scott Beck, while Warwick was defended by William Frazier Russell, Jr., self defence was the plea of Warwick's attorney, who argued strongly for acquittal. It seems that a fight started in Oscar Warwick's house between the prisoner and his uncle, August Warwick, at Gibbstown, near Massey. The latter went out and brought in a pistol and the fight was resumed, August Warwick being killed in the fracas. The case caused only ordinary interest. The jury, after deliberating a short time, found Oscar Warwick guilty of manslaughter and sentenced him to confinement of three years in Maryland Penitentiary.

Lillie Boyer, who was charged with being an accessory after the fact, when she aided Warwick to escape, was tried and sentence suspended.

The trial of Oscar Warwick occupied the court Monday and Tuesday.

There was no session on Wednesday.

TURKEY RAISING ON SHORE

Authorities State That This Section is Particularly Adapted to This Industry

Census figures show that the number of turkeys on farms in the United States decreased heavily during the period from 1900 to 1910, and that from 1910 to 1920 the number remained at about the figure of three and one-half million. There has been a good demand for turkeys during the holiday seasons, and because production has not exceeded demand, prices have remained good. The prevalence of disease, the tendency toward smaller farms, and the detailed attention required to rear young stock are the most plausible reasons for the reduction in the number of turkeys in the United States.

Numerous failures in turkey-raising can be traced to the practice of keeping various kinds of poultry in one general flock, with the result that each class is often neglected because of the other. It is under such conditions that turkeys suffer great mortality through ravages of disease and neglect. Under such conditions convenience for the person tending the young turkeys means a location near the house and on soil logged with manure and filth. Consequently, disease takes a heavy toll between the infrequent visits by the attendant who may be busy with other poultry or with other duties.

Obviously, turkey raisers, in order to be successful, should not be large chicken raisers, as the detailed attention required for success in one will detract from the attention devoted to the other, and lessen the chances for success in either. Any class of poultry does better in a flock by itself and particularly is this true of turkeys.

Turkey raising in Maryland is best adapted to certain parts of the Eastern Shore, to Southern Maryland, and to Mountain Sections in Western Maryland, where farms are large and provide a good range and natural food without provoking ill-feeling among neighbors, and where other live stock are not too numerous.

The right sort of breeding stock is one of the requisites for success in turkey raising. Since turkeys are exclusively meat fowls, breeding stock should be selected with a view to good meat production. Breeders should be selected which have good large frames and which approach the standard in weight and size. The back should be broad, especially across the shoulders, carrying the breadth well back to the tail. The body should be deep with a full, well rounded breast. The eye should be full and bright, the skull broad and legs stout in bone, setting well apart and not too long. The average turkey raiser is often unmindful of the quality of breeding stock available for reproduction. Many of them succumb to the temptation of taking the largest, quickest-growing and best developed young turkeys for the early market. After the flock goes through this process at Thanksgiving and again at Christmmas, only the small, unthrifty birds are left. As vigor and early maturity are highly essential in breeding stock, it is readily seen that such a course is suicidal if the grower intends to continue to raise turkeys. Purebreds are more profitable than crossbreds or mongrels, as it costs no more to raise them, and purebreds are usually heavier, make a better appearance and command a higher market price. Also, where good purebred stock is raised, surplus fowls may be sold for breeders at a price above that for meat, as there is always a good demand for such stock.

One early hatched young tom of large size and good vitality and twelve to fifteen good sized hens near standard weight and of good vigor make a nice mating for a small flock. Where twenty-five or thirty hens are kept in one breeding flock, two toms should be kept and alternated each day. Two toms in a flock will fight. Mating is thus interfered with and in fertile eggs may result. Some successful turkey raisers follow the plan each autumn of selecting their breeders so that the next year's breeding flock will consist of about one-fourth pullets, the largest and best developed; one-half yearling hens; and one-fourth two-year-old hens. A system of leg banding makes this possible.

A convenient area, fence in such a manner as to have no building, trees, or other rigid objects, such as gate tops or flat top fence posts, near to the fence line, will make it possible to confine the breeding flock until about mid-afternoon when laying is over. This may be especially desirable if the roosting place can be included in this fenced area. Then the gates may be closed at dusk and the trouble of penning in early morning eliminated. By providing suitable nests such as old barrels, the eggs be easily gathered and the flock well supervised. Under this arangement, the heavy feeding of the day should be in late afternoon so that the flock will return to their roosting quarters within the area fenced for them. Moving such a pen to a new location the second or third year might be advisable to prevent the soil from becoming too foul, thereby keeping down disease.

FARMERS DAY P ULAR

THOUSANDS FROM MARYLAND ATTEND ANNUL EVENT

Farmers' Day, an event which in former years has drawn thousands of farmers from all parts of the State to the University of Maryland, has been scheduled for Saturday, May 29, according to Dr. H. J. Patterson, director of the State Experiment Station and chairman of the committee on arrangements.

While a special program is usually arranged for Farmers' Day, the chief purpose of the event has always been to afford an opportunity for the public to visit the institution and to gain a better knowledge of the various lines of agricultural work which are in progress.

Those who visit the University this year will find completed several improvements that were just being started when the last Farmers' Day was held. At that time corner stones for the new dairy building, fronting on the Baltimore and Washington boulevard, and for the Ritchie Gymnasium were laid. The stadium and new athletic field were in the process of construction. All of these have been completed. In addition the landscape in the vicinity of the poultry plant has acquired the appearance of a small suburban development with the construction of a hundred houses for the hens entered in the Maryland State Egg Laying Contest.

Dairymen will find the new dairy building with its modern equipment of particular interest while it is expected that poultrymen will discover a new and valuable source of information in the laying contest. Crop and livestock experiments under way at the Experiment Station and the different laboratories will afford additional opportunities for visitors to learn what the university is doing to increase the knowledge of agriculture.
