POULTRY NOTES

ITEMS THAT WILL INTEREST OUR SOURCES

It is not uncommon, at this time of year, to hear of discouraging experiences with poor hatches, weak chicks, etc. There are many things, of course, which might be wholly or partially responsible for these discouraging results. Whatever the causes, the qualifications from a breeding standpoint of the parent stock are an ever-pertinent matter. Under the present-day system of management, on many farms, the lack of fitness of the flock used for breeding, is nearly always either wholly or partially responsible for poor hatching results. This lack of fitness is, of course, largely a matter of physical condition.

Hens or pullets which have been laying for some time are not in as good physical condition as when they commenced laying. Nature originally intended each egg a hen laid to be a chick, and a hen stores up a certain per cent of her total vital force in each egg she lays. Thus, after a long period of heavy laying, the physical condition of a hen is not so good as if she had been laying for only a short time, or had been laying less intensely. After a heavy period of production through Fall and Winter it is apparent that a hen's physical condition will not allow her to store the same vital force in her eggs in the Spring, that she might have stored had she not laid so heavily in the fall and winter.

It is significient that investigation reveals that most cases of poor hatches and week chicks in the spring are associated with, and follow high production of market eggs in fall and winter, as a result of management that stimulates fall and winter production, such as heavy protein or mash feeding, close confinement, and artificial lighting.

To eliminate losses through poor hatches and weakly chicks through such causes, hens whose eggs are to be hatched in spring should be selected in late summer and fall when the flock is culled, and given a separate house and run from the other hens and pullets which are to be managed for high egg production in fall and winter. Breeding hens should not be fed and managed with a view to inducing high production, before their eggs are desired for incubation. After hatching is over, good hens properly managed will give a good production throughout the summer and fall. This will give a more uniform production of market eggs from the entire flock, since the other flock which laid heavily the previous fall and winter, will be more likely to enter the yearly molt than the breeding hens.

Poultry raisers who are having unsatisfactory results in hatching, and who have not heretofore distinguished between laying and breeding flocks, will do well to give this matter more serious consideration.

To grow good chicks successfully indoors, requires study and experienced management. Even under experienced management, the cost of raising chicks indoors is usually much greater than if the chicks have access to a liberal outdoor run, especially after the weather has moderated in the spring. In close confinement the chicks have to be furnished all the feed they get, while those on a liberal range can pick up much natural food, which would otherwise be unused. The outdoor run with its pure air, sunshine, and with uncontanimated soil, gives the conditions furnished by nature, which for rapid and economical growth, cannot be successfully duplicated by artificial means. Outdoor runs promote activity and exercise, one of the greatest essentials to rapid and economical growth, while inducing exercise indoors is oftentimes a problem, especially for those with little experience.

Chicks should be outdoors every hour of the day that weather conditions permit, even when only a week or so old. Sunshine and fresh air are great aids to growth. Chicks which have been confined to the house for a few weeks because of unfavorable weather, will hesitate to go out when the door is open, even when the weather is favorable. When this occurs, move all feeding and drinking utensils out on the ground nearby, and run the chicks outside. Then by running them back in and then out again, they will readily learn to go inside to the heat if they become too cool. If the weather is good, few will choose to go back inside, but will remain outside with the food and drink, or range in the small enclosed area near the house which should be provided. Thereafter, the chicks should be allowed outside every day when the weather permits. Moving the feed and drink outside will encourage the chicks to remain out. The outside run should be increased every few days by moving out the portable wire roll enclosing it, until the chicks can use the entire permanently fenced run, or free range.

All the range possible should be allowed after the chicks begin to range much. The natural food secured by them on range, as well as the exercise, fresh air and sunshine, will induce the most economical, efficient and rapid growth possible.

Culling of the chicks should commence at the time they are put in the brooder. Weakly, deformed, chicks should be promptly killed and burned as they will only make cull stock later on, even though they live. Such chicks are a source of danger to the strong chicks should they be diseased.

Farmers, List Your Repair Needs

It would be hard to find a farmer who at some time or another had not lost valuable time waiting for necessary repair parts. Take this territory and total up the time lost in this way and it will astonish you. And all because repairs are not odered as early as they should be.

There is no better time than right now—just before the busiest season on the farm—to go over your machines carefully, make a list of repairs you are likely to need and send it to us. With this list in our hands, we can order our stock so as to be prepared to meet every call promptly.

Repair part service is a necessary part of our business. We realize what it means to you in time and money to get what you need at once. Help us to help you by making up your list now and sending it in to us.
