POULTRY NOTES

ITEMS THAT WILL INTEREST OUR READERS GATHERED HERE AND THERE

We all know that the season has been an extremely backward one, cold, raw and with a scarcity of sunlight. Farm crops have been put in to the ground much later than usual; grass was backward, and even well into May, temperatures were unseasonably down.

Reports, in the east at least, of fertility and hatchability of eggs were discouraging and as a consequence we believe that the number of chicks hatched before May was much below normal. This seemed to prevail in different sections of the country, and with practically all of the varieties and many of the producers of day-old chicks were hard put to it to make deliveries.

In our own experiences we have scarcely ever experienced a more discouraging early season, although our birds were maintained under precisely the same conditions as usual, and we have no doubt but that similar reports in large quantities could be obtained from most sources.

It is essential that the necessary number of chicks be hatched and raised, and if we did not succeed in March, April or May in getting out our full quota, we must resort to June chicks in order to make up the balance.

Many people think that it is not worth while to hatch chicks in June since they fear that they will not reach sufficient size or maturity by the time cold weather arrives, and will therefore, not be productive from a breeding or commercial point of view until the following season. Such fears are well grounded if June chicks are not given special care, or at least, as much care as the earlier broods. We have always thought that the reason for the apparent backwardness of June chicks, was the fact that they did not receive the care that they should have.

The poultry meat industry is fast becoming recognized as of a broad commercial value. Poultry has been one of the chief sources of human food the world over, so the poultryman of today finds that to condition and sell his poultry is as much a part of his business as it is to produce it.

Artificial refrigeration has been largely responsible for the growth in the modern markets. Artifical refrigeration makes it possible for the farmer to sell eggs in April and poultry in November at prices that are profitable. The commercial development of the poultry industry is due to the railroad facilities and the improvement of refrigerator cars.

A hen down in Missouri has laid one thousand eggs in six years. She laid her thousandth egg February, 26, 1926. The long time layer is a paying fowl as her breeding propensities have been proven and one knows just what they will get from a hen kept over several years. It has been proven that the yearling hen is more profitable as a breeder than the pullet and the two year old hen is the safe hen as a breeder, because one knows what kind of eggs she lays and the kind of chick she produces. The early hatched, February pullet often proves to be as good a breeder as the hen she has good maturity when the next Spring comes on and in age is a hen, as she is over twelve months old when March comes around.

June is the month of roses, marriages and the beginning of summer. June looks back to Spring and forward to Fall. One can now begin to cull the early chicks for all those that are defective, a little early for color culling but all disqualified fowls for side sprigs, crooked backs, squirrel tails, bad toes and legs. Too early for earlobe disqualifications to show in both the red eared, as well as the white eared fowls. There are some color disqualifications that are showing now that may not be in the plumage later but there are also disqualifications that will show now that can be culled out of the flock.

The United States Senate has passed the law appropriating $20,000, to pay the expenses of the delegates to the World's Poultry Congress at Ottawa, Canada. This great gathering will be held in the summer of 1927. This appropriation was recommended by both the Secretaries of Commerce and Agriculture and it was recommended to Congress in a message by President Calvin Coolidge. This is one of the times when the poultry industry gets real endorsement from the United States government. It is not said how the delegates will be appointed to this great gathering but it's supposed that who ever the Agricultural Department endorses will go. If that department wants a truly representative delegation, the delegates could be appointed from the different districts of the American Poultry Association. That would make every part of the country have represetation. The list as given out by Professor M. A. Jull, only names of educators are mentioned.

Rounded perches, made of two by four scantling, make the best roosts. If roosts are too small, one gets lots of crooked breasts in the young fowls.

The prejudice against black fowls would soon be gone if the poultrymen would market only those fowls fit to be picked. Never send a fowl to market that is not free of pin feathers, if you hope for peak prices.

The question of which fowl is best for the average poultrymen is often asked by the amateur. The answer is, the one you like the best.

It is said that Madison Square Garden held its best show in 1926, yet some people say that the fancy is dead.
