POULTRY NOTES

ITEMS THAT WILL INTEREST OUR READERS UPON TRINELY SUBJECTS

The following is put out by the State Poultry authorities and will help our readers with their poultry problems:

Heavy losses through diseases or parasites in any poultry flock may often be prevented by taking a few well directed precautions. In order to do this, the poultry raiser should exert a reasonable effort to determine the cause of death or sickness which may befall any bird in the flock. The desire for this knowledge should always prompt an examination or autopsy of dead birds in order that the cause of the trouble may be determined. Proper steps should then be taken to prevent the trouble from becoming epidemic, and causing heavy losses.

Sick or dead birds should always be promptly removed from the flock, in order that their menace to the rest of the flock may be eliminated. If the cause of the trouble is not in plain evidence from the outside, a post-mortem examination should be made. It is comparatively easy to open and examine the internal organs of young chicks, but it is more of a task to examine almost grown or adult fowls. A quick method of examining large fowls is as follows:

Lay the fowl upon its back upon a table or other convenient place. With the fowl's feet towards the operator, take the skin between the end of the breast bone and vent with the fingers and with a small sharp knife cut through to the body cavity; then insert the knife and cut well forward on both sides of the breast of the fowl over close to the things. If the cuts are properly made the entire breast of the fowl is disconnected except at the force part of the body. The thighs should then be dislocated at the lips by pressing them down flat. The viscera may then be exposed by holding the back of the bird on the table with one hand and with the other pulling the rear part of the breast upward and forcing it forward. In making the cuts, care should be used not to insert the knife so deeply in the body that the internal organs will be mutilated, as they should be examined in the natural state.

Space will not permit a discussion of the affections of the various organs by different diseases, but indications and symptoms of abnormality of the different organs can be detected in most causes by who is familiar with the normal condition of the internal organs of a fowl.

By using a smallpair of scissors the intestines may be slit open their entire length to observe their condition and to look for intestinal worms.

All organs should be closely examined for abnormalities, especially the liver, spleen, and intestines. By referring to text-books and bulletins on poultry diseases the disease or trouble may be usually identified, and the recommended preventive and control measures instituted.

The season is now close at hand when poultry diseases and troubles are most prevalent. Prompt action is necessary to prevent heavy losses.

Clean houses and runs are a great help in preventing diseases through the hot months. The houses should be cleaned and sprayed, and the premises cleaned as often as necessary to maintain good sanitation. Where the flock has free range and access to high weeds and dense growths, search should be made every few days for sick or dead birds. Dead birds should be removed to prevent Botulism or Limberneck. Better still, the flock should be fenced to a given area of land which is a suitable range. This affords better supervision and management.

If you are unable to identify a disease outbreak or trouble in your flock sick birds sent or brought to the Poultry Department, or Bacteriology Department of the University at College Park, will be examined and recommendations given free of charge.

Cull Young Stock Now

Practically every flock of chicks has a few individuals that are not as thrifty as the average of the flock. Whatever the cause, these individuals are a source of danger to the remainder of the flock because of their susceptibility to disease, if not already diseased, and will always be inferior individuals. Because of these handicaps such individuals should be culled from the flock, killed and burned. Such individuals as are unmistabably lagging in their development should be promptly removed from the flock. Sufficient range and quarters should always be given the growing flock so that the flock will have a good chance to develop properly into birds which will be profitable.

Seperate The Sexes

Pullets will develop much better and into individuals of greater laying capacity if they are given a separate run from the cockerels, after the cockerel shave commenced to annoy them. This annoyance prevents the pullets from getting a proper share of food, and they may become hurt by some of the larger cockerels. All cockerels which are not to be saved as breeding stock, should be promptly sold on the market when they reach a good broiler stage.
