POULTRY NOTES

ITEMS THAT WILL HELP OUR READERS BE MORE SUCCESSFUL WITH POULTRY

Care carefully for next year's breeders. They must not be neglected for one single week. Don't let them get over-fat this month of luxury. Don't rush them too fiercely at the laying nest. Just keep an easy eye on them and see that they have the best that is going so that they may do the best possible for you next year. It will not hurt your next year's breeding hens to lay a fair number of eggs. Too many people simply neglect the hens that are to be the mothers of next year's chickens. This is a mistake. Keep them in A-No. 1 condition all summer long and all the fall. The farmer who does not look carefully after the character and condition of the soil from which he is to raise his most valuable crops is certainly making a very great blunder. So with his breeding cows and hogs and sheep. Why not so also with the poultryman's breeding birds? Favor them. Use "Sense" in the handling of them. If they are not as good as you want. look about among the advertisements of this paper and buy some more. This is a fine time of the year to purchase some of the best breeders in America. They may be purchased at reduced prices at this end of the breeding season. If you fail to purchase them this month some other fellow will get them this month some other fellow will get them and you are out.

This is truly the age of specialization. The man who conducts his business today as he did twenty or even ten years ago is rapidly losing ground to the man employing the more aggressive modernized principles necessary to meet competition. Just as the plow share followed the crooked stick, as the cradle followed the sickle, as the threshing machine followed the flail in the early history of agricultural development; just as artificial incubating and brooding followed the natural hen method of hatching and raising, so today we find ready prepared commercial poultry feeds taking the place of Johnnie cake and shelled corn, used in the days of our grand and great grandmothers. We can hardly expect to meet competition using the walking plow against the modern tractor propelled gang plow, which turns over several acres per day. We can not waste time and money feeding a flock of non-producing hens and keep up with the man who culls his flock and knows every ounce of feed consumed is utilized by a fowl of modern tested ability. Neither can we waste time preparing and mixing poultry rations from grains the analysis of which is problematical and compete with the man who uses a scientifically chemically analyzed and properly mixed ration.

The life of a chick is divided into two parts—the brooding period, which includes the time from hatching until removed from heat and placed in summer quarters. With many, the brooding period has passed, and most of your attention will be directed to the second part—the growing period—which includes the time when chicks are placed in summer quarters until they go in laying quarters for the final test. With too many of us, there is the mistaken idea that if a chick is well cared for until past the baby stage when death can come so swiftly and surely, that he will stand a great deal of neglect and abuse and still make a good bird. They may live, but will never repay their owner for the money expended on them—and in order to assist each poultryman to mature a flock of thrifty, vigorous pullets and gallant, peppy males we are touching on some of the old points in a new way.

ASPARAGUS CROP INFERIOR.

Asparagus has not been up to standard this year in Kent. Getting off to a late season, when the markets were stocked with "grass" from other more fortunate sections, prices received were not at all in keeping with those of last season, and throughout the entire period weather conditions have seemed to militate against the growth. The revenue derived this year, according to statements made by a number of the leading growers, will amount to not more than fifty per cent of last year's return. It has been estimated that an average crop of asparagus is worth from $125,000 to $150,000 to the growers of Kent county, but it is not believed that the total revenue from this year's crop will exceed $75,000.
