LYNCHINGS ON DECLINE

Outside of Florida, there has not been a lynching in the entire Southeast during the first six months in this year—this including the two Carolinas and Alabama and Tennessee. One effort at lynching was made in North Carolina, but the officers were equal to the emergency, as they can be in almost every case when the officers are determined to uphold the integrity of the law. Lynchings in the past have been too often traceable—even if legally unproven—to collusion between officers and the mob.

The record thus far in the South is a marvelous improvement over that of a few years ago, when we usually had more lynchings in one State in six months than now shown in the entire South and Southwest combined—Atlanta Constitution.
