Teamwork Keynote of Success

The operators of your central office are everlastingly plugging for you. Here, "actions speak louder than words."

IF

(With apologies to Kipling)

If you can watch your board when all about you
The rows of shining signals wax and wane;
If you can challenge in on all your flashes,
And on the lingering one-lights do the same.
If you can overlap, and keep from lapping
Into the adjacent operator's way,
And work on speed, and yet be safe from errors,
And see that observations are O. K.
If you can do all this, and not go boasting,
But do it in a just and generous way,
The road of progress has been opened to you,
You'll be a "Central Chief," my girl, some day.

—VIRGINIA MULLAN,
Baltimore Telephone Operator.

Teamwork is the keynote of success. Every business, industry or individual that has ever amounted to anything had to have co-ordination and teamwork to bring about the results obtained. On investigation you will find that the success of any industry is dependent on the teamwork of the several departments or with the employees in each individual department. The successive operation of a utility depends on the teamwork of its employees.

A homely illustration of teamwork was impressed on the writer a number of years ago while driving with a gentleman behind a pair of horses who were of about equal size and speed, but one was lazy while the other, attended strictly to pulling her part of the load. The horse on the "near" side threw her weight into the collar and kept it there while the "off" horse had to be touched up with the whip every once in a while. The gentleman accompanied each flick of the whip with a firm admonition "do your duty, Sam," which always brought about results for the time being, but must be repeated often. In working with people during the past quarter of a century the writer has often been struck with the similarity of workmen to that team.

As an example visualize the operations of the telephone system, which has made a neighborhood of the nation. There could be no telephone service without the switchboards and associate equipment, the poles, wires, cables, conduit lines and other plant over which the conversations are carried between subscribers in the same locality, or from one community to another in the same state or even to a distant state or country.

Before a telephone office is established the engineers must go over the ground carefully and make a survey of the conditions to see whether a central office is needed. Among the things to be considered are the number of people in that particular community who may be expected to require telephone service at the present time or within the near future. Another factor which is given serious consideration is the number of people who may locate in this community within five, ten, fifteen, or twenty years and the class of business which they will operate.

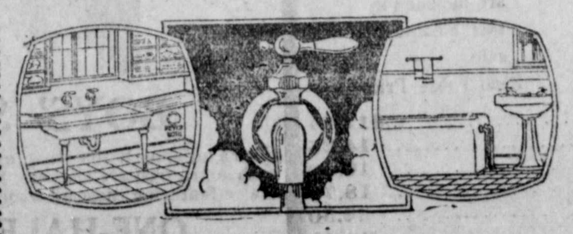

With these facts in hand the engineers figure from past performances in other sections what may be expected in the way of telephone growth and what revenue may be expected from the service which will be furnished.

After this is done other engineers must figure the construction costs of building the necessary plant including switchboards, frames, batteries, poles, cross-arms, wire, and cable, and the maintenance and operation of the system. When this is completed and the officials pass on the estimate the work is authorized. Then the supply department must be called on to furnish the material with which the plant will be constructed. After the installation is finished the system is turned over to the operating and maintenance departments who must carry on the service and see that the various units of plant function properly and work together to furnish the public with a satisfactory communication system.

The operators at the switchboards must work together in the interest of good service. Each operator is trained to answer calls and establish communications on her position of the board and to help other operators adjacent to her position as required. In doing this she must carry on her work in an efficient way so that she is helpful in her efforts to assist her fellow workers.

The wire chief who supervises the installation and maintenance of the telephones and plant must have the co-operation of his installers and repairmen; in order to co-operate successfully with the manager and chief operator each of whom is responsible for a particular branch of telephone service.

Every phase of the business all the way from the president of the company down to the last office boy calls for teamwork.
