PRESIDENT'S HOME, FIRST PUBLIC BUILDING IN THE NATION'S CAPITOL

The White House, Seat of Executive Functions of Government, One of Most Beautiful Buildings in Washington

The President's Principal Contacts With the Nation Are Newspapers, Telephone Lines and Radio

THE White House, the first public building erected in Washington the Federal City, is the most famous residence in the country. This mansion located on Pennsylvania Avenue is a shrine to every patriotic American and thousands and thousands of people visit it annually.

Being the seat of the executive functions of the American Government, the White House is fittingly one of the most beautiful buildings in the Capital.

While its simplicity is in keeping with the democratic ideals of the United States, one would never call the interiors of the White House "palatial;" the halls and rooms are large and impressive, but simply designed and decorated. The offices in the western annex are much plainer in their furnishings than the executive headquarters of many large corporations.

At the main entrance to the White House members of a special police force are stationed, and in the entrance hall are ushers to meet expected guests or friends of the President's family. To one's right, as the house is entered, the head usher has an office. Upon him rests the responsibility of seeing that visitors are properly received, and that the interior appearance of the White House is orderly.

Persons who are invited to visit the President or a member of his family may be shown to the second floor, where are the private living rooms, study and library. One room on the first floor which is frequently used by Mrs. Coolidge is the Red Room, reached by passing through the main entrance hall. The color scheme of this room is red, save for a marble mantel. It is rich in paintings, there being full-length portraits of George and Martha Washington, and some of those who have been occupants of the White House in the past.

Passing from the Red Room to the east, one enters the Blue Room and then the Green Room, both of which are used for the reception of guests on formal occasions. Especially when diplomats are received are these rooms in use.

Also, on the second floor are the private living quarters of the White House family, the President's library and study, and rooms for guests.

In former years the White House offices also were located on the second floor, but in those days the amount of business to be transacted was much less than it is now, and the clerical force was much smaller. When the office was moved into the annex, the space vacated in the residence was converted into living quarters.

The President's office is on the south side of the building, with his secretary's office adjoining it on the west. To the east is a small room where the President can confer privately, and beyond this in the southeast corner is the room where the President and his Cabinet confer.

One room in the office building is devoted to wire communication facilities. The telephone private branch exchange switchboard is located here and is under the supervision of the Executive Clerk and his force. Telephone calls for the President are answered by one of the men of this force, all of whom has had long experience at the White House, and only those callers who are known to have legitimate business with him are allowed to talk. Incidentally, the President does not talk over the telephone while at his desk.

Long-distance telephone service is extensively used, although it is not necessary to lease circuits, for the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company is prepared to make connections with virtually any city or town in the United States as quickly as it is required.

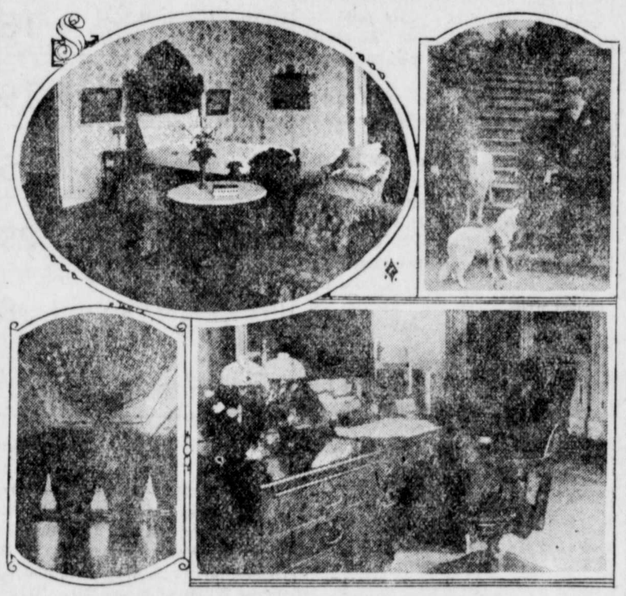

Through the White House switchboard the President and his force have direct communication with all major departments of the government and with the Capitol. In the President's residence there are telephones in his study and other rooms, as well as in the head usher's office at the private entrance.

The President is a believer in the efficiency of the telephone in business and originates many calls. The switchboard is so arranged as to facilitate the handling of the President's calls in the quickest manner as there are direct lines to the offices of the officials with whom he is most likely to talk frequently. Direct connection can be made with the Secretary of War, Secretary of the Treasury, and so on. In all there are about fifteen private lines which give the White House direct connection with the homes or private offices of high government officials.

Other direct lines connect with the private branch exchange switchboards of the other government departments, making quick conversation possible in case the White House officials should want to talk with any of the bureau chiefs or minor officials in those departments.

Direct lines go to the Capitol, connecting with a booth convenient to the Senate chamber. Should the President or his Secretary desire to talk with anyone on the floor of the Senate, the operator at the White House would ring this booth and ask the clerk who answered to summon the person called. Direct connection can be made with the regular Capitol switchboard in case the White House wishes to talk to any member of Congress in his office.

The President's two principal contacts with the nation at large are through radio and the newspapers. President Coolidge has been heard by more people than any other President; probably by more than all others put together. Nearly all his important speeches now are broadcast, and telephone lines are instrumental in enabling people in all sections of the country to hear them.

LONG DISTANCE GUN SALUTE

When Rear Admiral Thomas Washington settled down to his duties a short time ago as commandant of the Twelfth Naval District, with headquarters at San Francisco, he was given a "long distance" gun-salute by telephone. Admiral Washington relieved Rear Admiral John H. Dayton, commandant of the Mare Island Navy Yard, who had been filling both posts. When the orders of the two officers were read in the presence of ranking officers of the district the gun salute was sounded over a direct telephone line between San Francisco and the receiving ship at Goat Island. It was a pleasing tribute to a widely known naval officer as he assumed a new command, according to the Pacific Telephone Magazine.

HERE AND THERE ON THE DEL-MAR-VA PENINSULA

ITEMS OF INTERESTS PREPARED BY DEL-MAR-VA EASTERN SHORE ASSOCIATION

The Del-Mar-Va Eastern Shore Association is promoting a "Home Consumption of Del-Mar-Va Products Program" in the interest of the farmer, the merchant, and the consumer, through the medium of the local Chambers of Commerce. This is said to be the initial step of the Association in seeking a solution to the difficulties in marketing Del-Mar-Va products.

The Peninsula Produce Exchange is erecting greenhouses near Pocomoke for the cultivation of flowers on a wholesale scale. Mr. W. E. Shears has charge of this work for the Exchange. The Del-Mar-Va Peninsula is becoming more and more known for its various kinds of nurseries.

The demand for oysters has exceeded the supply so far this year. Up to the present, Crisfield has shipped 200,000 bushels Special attention is being given now to supplying the markets for the holiday season. Besides carloads of shucked stock going into the North, many are daily being routed into the middle west.

Indications of the diversification from the main crop in Virginia Counties is given this year by the large quantity of cabbages which have been planted in Northampton County in the vicinity of Eastville.

KENT TREES MAKE GROWTH

Kent County trees made the greatest growth during 1926 that they have made during any similar period in the last century, according to forestry experts who have been making an extensive study of trees throughout America. Foresters have discovered that the annual ring growth of trees during the last twelve months is twice the width of former years. Unusually mild weather, plentiful rainfall and very little wind proved beneficial to forest growth. Recent examinations of new growth rings is amazing, report loggers and student foresters. It is possible in the study of ring growth to discover whether former years were cold or warm, in connection with the thin or wide expansion of the tree trunks.

ANYWHERE TO ANYWHERE—BY TELEPHONE

There is a way to SAVE on your LONG DISTANCE CALLS

ISN'T this about the way you make most of your long distance calls?

When the operator answers you tell her "I want to speak to John Y. Evans, the Ajax Manufacturing Company, 234 Pearl Street, New York City." She must then connect you with Mr. Evans and no one else.

Here is a way you can do much of your long distance telephoning for less money and with greater speed. Mr. Evans is probably in his office when you make your call and if not, someone else can talk for him. Then why not tell the operator "I want anyone at the Ajax Manufacturing Company," or simply give her their telephone number if you know it. On a call of say 150 miles to a particular person, the charge is $1.20; the rate when we simply connect you to the out-of-town telephone is 95c.

The first way of calling is termed person-to-person service; the other and simpler way is station-to-station service. The latter makes less work for our operators with less use of our lines and we pass the savings along to you.

Think of this when you are making long distance calls, either business or social. Telephone users are turning more and more to station-to-station service as a speedier and cheaper way of doing their long distance telephoning. Over half the messages we now handle are on this basis.
