

SILO FILLING EQUIPMENT

NEW COMBINE SOLVES SILAGE HANDLING PROBLEM

Many new silos are being built in Kent County this year. Some farmers will be buying new machinery for harvesting the silage corn and for filling the silos.

Attention of such men is called to a real labor saving machine now being successfully used in Maryland and other States. A group of farmers forming a "ring" similar to threshing rings or "Spray Rings" could well afford to buy such an outfit and use it to fill all of their silos. Anyone putting up several hundred tons of silage can well afford to own an outfit of this sort.

The new method is known as the "Ronning Method." It is one type of combine in that it performs two distinct steps in handling ensilage corn. It cuts the corn from the row, chops it in silage lengths, and delivers the cut material to a wagon box to be hauled to the silo and blown into the silo.

A strong tractor with power take-off is osed to operate the machine. One man operates both tractor and machine. Several grain wagons haul the cut material to the silo where it is delivered to a blower or silage cutter. The illustrations show the machine at work and one device for transferring the cut material from the wagon to the blower. One man operates the blower and the small engine that drives it.

Those who have wrestled with wet bundles of tall silage corn know it is no easy task to load or unload the wagon. They will appreciate the merit of a machine that eliminates this heavy hard work. Easier, faster work, with a small gang speeds up silo filling and saves real money at the same time. No twine for binding is required. Board bill for help is reduced.

Professor Metzger of the University of Maryland reports that a Mr. Kelley, farming near Gaithersburg, Maryland, used a very practical way of unloading the cut material. He built up the sides of his manure spreader so it would carry two tons of the cut corn. He attached a ratchet to the web, turns off the silage by hand into the carriage of the blower at a big saving of time and men as compared with the old plan.

TheCounty Agent will be pleased to furnish further information to those interested in this real money-saving equipment. Much information on silos and silage is available. There is place for many more silos in Kent County. Farmers should be sure of their ground before buying or building. A silo means larger and cheaper milk production.

Dishonesty Taken for Granted in Business?

When we consider the centuries of preaching that honesty is the best policy, it is surprising how little has been accomplished. Every business place has a cashier to watch the clerks, and see that they properly turn in the money. And the cashier herself is watched by a cash register. The honesty of almost everyone is doubted. There can be no reasonable objection to giving a man credit who will pay next week, but cash stores are becoming almost the rule. And they are an insult to our professions of honesty.

Why are so many dishonest? There is not the slightest question that honesty is the best policy, from a practical as well as from a religious standpoint, but I should be ashamed to print here the per cent of the dishonest as estimated by practical men who deal with the public.

What is the flaw in the argument? Why have we been unable to learn the most important of all lessons? Why as a race do we butt our heads for centuries against a pitiless stone wall? With all our intelligence, why do we continue to be such scoundrels?—E. W. Howe's Monthly.

Junior Did Not Quite Get Mother's Meaning

Junior was called upon to explain to his dad why he had evidently told the child next door such a seemingly patent untruth.

"Junior, haven't you been taught that to be guilty of prevaricating is sufficient reason for your being punished severely?"

The Stroller (who is an uncle of the youngster) noted with some amusement that the weight of the large words used upon the lad was having little effect.

"What did I do wrong, daddy?" the child asked.

"Didn't you tell Howard that mother owned a station and that you think she's going to give it to you full of trains?"

"Sure, daddy," replied the youngster, "I heard mother tell Mrs. Jones that the lady who just moved in was below her station and that she couldn't join the bridge club.' Daddy, if mother had a station, wouldn't she give me some trains?"

Man Wears Flapper's Skirt

The Arabian nomad effects an attire which might lead to his being mistaken for a modern flapper. The lower part of his anatomy is covered with a garment which has every appearance of being a feminine skirt. It reaches about to his knees and is held in place by a sash of some gay colors. A loose blouse and short sleeves completes the garb. His home is a portable one and he moves about with his family to suit his convenience.

The equipment of the home is very meager and in a few minutes he can take down his tent and move to another location. If he farms he makes use of a plough that might have done service in Biblical times, a very crude wooden implement drawn by two oxen.

If Comet Should Hit Earth

Professor Todd says that if the head of a large comet should collide with the earth, probably the air and water would be instantly consumed and dissipated, and a considerable region of the earth's surface raised to incandescence. It might happen that diffusion of noxious gases from sudden combustion of hydrocarbon compounds would so vitiate the atmosphere as to render it unsuitable for breathing. In this manner, while the earth itself, its oceans and human dwellings, might escape unharmed, such an event might mean universal death to nearly all forms of animal existence.

Inventors Kept Busy

To each succeeding age it appears that "Everything seems to have been done." So it seemed, writes Merle Thorpe in Nation's Business, in 1883 to the head of the patent office, who wanted to resign because he felt the limit of human invention had been reached and that there was no further need of his services. By 1800 there were less than 43,000 patents recorded; by the end of the century, 640,000. Today the applications for patents have risen to 90,000 a year!

Papal Pronouncements

A papal bull is a letter sealed with a bulla or with a red ink imprint of the device on a bulla. Bulls since 1878 have been dated by the civil calendar. Prior to this they were written on rough parchment and dated "a die Incarnationis" ("from the day of the incarnation"). The bulla used is a round leaden seal, which has on one side a representation of St. Peter and St. Paul and on the other the name of the pope who uses it.
