DISCUSS TOMATO SITUATION

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AND FARM BUREAU MEET

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Kent County Chamber of Commerce and the Board of the Kent County Farm Bureau and County Agent J. D. McVean at the headquarters of the Chamber last Saturday February 22, the local problem of tomato raisers and contracts was discussed from all angles in a cooperative effort of those two bodies and the Extension Service to discover some satisfactory method of taking care of the Kent crop for 1930.

The question of different price contracts had been raised by Mr. Walter M. Kenly at a previous meeting of the Board of the Chamber when he stated that last year saw Kent farmers contracting for 20, 22 1-2 and 25 cents per basket. It was discussed at that time and voted that the Farm Bureau and the representative of the Extension service be called in on consultation. The Chamber has made it plain that it desires to cooperate with all forces organized to aid the farmer in every way possible without trespassing on the prerogative of any organization whatever.

One canner was present at the meeting Saturday and emphasized the fact that there is also a problem on that side of the business as well as the growers'.

The outcome of the conference was the appointment of a Committee of Investigation, Walter M. Kenly, chairman, James D. Davis, Secretary of the Kent County Farm Bureau and J. D. McVean, County Agent, who are to report to the two Boards at a future meeting.

While in conference twenty-five cents, per basket, for 1930 tomatoes was the best price reported but it is said immediately after the meeting the report was on the street of 27 1-2 cents and a faint rumor of the possibility of 30 cents being reached in some sections of the County.

The farmer is urged to cooperate in this matter as no doubt a great deal may be accomplished. Last year's varied prices show the result of the lack of concerted action on the part of the farmer. In the recent slump in the turkey market, for instance, one prominent grower in Kent declares they were saved by following the sound advice of County Agent McVean who advised the growers not to get panic stricken. This particular grower held back and refused to sell at the rock bottom price and benefitted considerably when the price rose after the holiday season.

A VICIOUS OYSTER

Savannah, Ga., Jan. 4.—When curiosity killed a cat, it became history, but when nosiness killed a wild duck recently it became front page news. The duck poked its bill into the private affairs of a modest and reserved oyster, and the oyster snapped its shell up. Result—a dead duck.

The unusual battle was witnessed by T. W. Hawley, Jimmie Mays and R. M. Culver, of Savannah, while they were hunting ducks, along the coast near here recently. As they ran their boat around a point they were attracted by a frantic beating of wings and a great splashing of water. The uproar evidently was made by a duck in distress, which had its head under water, ostrich fashion.

They drew nearer, speculating on what denison of the deep might be fighting a duck. At first they thought it must be a shark, but this theory was abandoned when they realized a fish would carry the fight over a larger area. But neither contestant, the visible nor the invisible one, moved. The fowl seemed to be trying every trick inherent nature provided, but could not free itself from the hidden foe. Mr. Hawley raised his gun and fired. The duck fluttered again and quieted to the water's surface, as if death came as a relief.

Belligerent Oysters

Paddling nearer, the hunters reached down to pick up their duck. To their amazement, they found it anchored, down by the head as the sailors say. One of the men reached into the water and felt for the head of the duck. It was clamped vise-like between the shells of a big oyster. Nor would the bivalve give up its prey, Mr. Hawley attempted to yank loose the bird— a drake shell duck—but to do so would have meant pulling its head from its body. The hunters used their boat paddles to break the oyster from its bed.

When the duck was dragged from the water the oyster came with it. Had not hunters interferred, the bird would have drowned within a few minutes anyhow.

The duck was brought to Savannah and placed on display with the oyster still attached, in the window of Stubbs Hardware company. The exhibit did not last overnight, however, for a big owl in the window philosophically accepted what fate handed him, and ate the duck. However, he proved that he was a wise bird, for he left the oyster alone, although it still retained the duck's head between its shell.

While the slaying of a duck by an oyster is not altogether unheard of, it is a rarity. The belligerent proclivities of an oyster, however, have been attested by local hunters before.

Very often, coons are caught or slain and upon examination, it is found that they have but three feet. It is quite an established fact that a coon, once caught by an oyster, will chew off its own foot, rather than suffer death by drowning with a rising tide, or by starvation.

Fights in Self-Defense

The oyster's fighting, of course, is waged with ferocious intensity in self-defense. The duck was attempting to suck the bivalve from its shell, which served with just as much efficiency as did the stronghold castles of the feudal lords in medieval Europe. The oyster, heretofore regarded as senseless and defensless, was too quick for even the fleeting wild duck!

Dr. William K. Brooks, Ph. D., professor of animal morphology at Johns Hopkins and director of the Chesapeake Zoological Laboratory, has made an exhaustive and interesting study of the oyster which, to a large measure, explains the odd incident which occurred near Savannah.

The most prominent fact in the organization of the oyster, says Dr. Brooks, is the shell. The body is shut in between two long concave stony doors, which are made of limestone, and are fastened together at one end, somewhat in the same way that the covers of a check book are bound together at the back. One of these shells, the flat one, is on the right side of the body and the other, which is much deeper, on the left.

When oysters are fastened to each other or to rocks, the left shell is attached and the oyster lies on its left side. When it is "at home" and undisturbed, its shell is open, so that the water circulates within it, but when disturbed it shuts its shell with a snap, and is able to keep it firmly closed for a long time. The snapping drives out the water, together with any irritating substances which may find their way in, and on the natural beds the oyster snaps its shell shut, from time to time for this purpose. The snapping is sometimes called feeding, but it is nothing of the kind. It serves to drive food out instead of taking it in. The food of the oyster consists of invisible organisms which float in the water and are drawn in with it.

Fishermen Killed by Oysters

The apparatus for opening and closing the shell provides the oyster's defense against danger and intruders. It works not unlike a book with a piece of rubber wedged between the leaves, close to the back. This forms a spring which would be squeezed by closing the book and would, when released open it again. The book with such a spring would remain open at all times, except when forcibly closed.

Wedged in between the two shells of the oyster, at their narrow ends, is an elastic pad, the hinge ligament which acts in exactly the same manner. When the shell is forcibly closed the ligament is squeezed and it expands when it is released and thus throws the free edges of the shell apart. The ligament is not alive. It is formed like the shell itself, as an excretion from the living tissue of the oyster, and its action is not under the control of the bivalve. It keeps the shell open at all times, unless counteracted and, for this reason an oyster at rest for a "dead oyster" always has the shell open.

The active work of squeezing the passive ligament and closing the shell is done by a large and powerful muscle, made up of a bundle of contractile fibres which run across the body between the shells and are fastened to the inner surfaces over the dark colored spots, which are always seen on empty oyster shells, the shell to open because it destroys the cutting of this muscle causes the oyster's power to close it; but a fresh oyster on the half shell is no more dead than one which has yet to be disturbed from its native bed.

It is reported from reliable sources that when lone fishermen are caught by the feet or hands between the shells of the giant clams of the Pacific they seldom, if ever, escape alive, but are held there as if by a vise until the tide rises and puts an end to their suffering.

"DEVIL MAY CARE" ROMANCE FILM

RAMON NOVARRO FIGHTS WAY THROUGH ADVENTURES IN FIRST TALKIE

Ramon Novarro, dressed in the handsome uniform of a lieutenant of Napoleon Bonaparte, making his escape from a firing squad; climbing into a bautiful young woman's bedroom; masquerading as a footman; duelling his way to fame and fortune; these are some of the sequences of "Devil-May-Care," Novarro's all-talking screen romance which will show on Wednesday and Thursday, March 5 and 6, at the New Lyceum Theatre.

The new picture, adapted from the French play, "La Bataille des Dames," is said to be a perfect vehicle for the romantic Novarro. The story tells of the adventures of Armand, the exiled Napoleon's trusted lieutenant who schemes to bring back his liege to the throne of France. When he falls in love with Leonie, ardent Royalist complications begin.

Sidney Franklin, director of the production, is said to have set a new standard for camera excellence. Among the scenes which stand out are "shots" of a cavalry troop riding down a mountain road; the historic scene in which Napoleon bids farewell to his guard; a forest glade in which Armand and Leonie go horseback riding; scenes in a French chateau and a scene filmed in technicolor in a reproduction of the gardens at Versailles.

The supporting cast of "Devil-May-Care" includes Dorothy Jordan as Leonie, Marion Harris as Countess Louise, John Milijan as the villainous de Grignon, and others.

Navarro sings a variety of attractive musical numbers in the picture written by Herbert Stothart and Clifford Grey. Songs are also sung by Miss Harris, who is well known as a "blues" singer, and Miss Jordan, who was formerly in New York musical comedies. The musical numbers range from sentimental love songs such as "Charming," "If He Cared" and "The Shepherd's Serenade," to the comedy songs, "Pompadour" and "Bon Jour, Louie," and the rollicking Military number, "March of the Old Guard," which Novarro sings with a large chorus.
