Mexican Coat of Arms Traced to Aztec Fable

That the name "Mexico" comes from "mexictli," the Aztec word for the native maguey or pulque plant, is the conclusion of Enrique Juan Palacios, of the Mexican direction for archeology, who has searched for its origin in native Indian documents, as well as in other sources of information. Every Mexican school child knows that his national coat-of-arms is an adaptation of the ancient Aztec hieroglyph or place-name for "Tenochtitlan," as pre-conquest Mexico City was called. Mexico's shield, therefore, is at least six centuries old. It represents an eagle in mortal struggle with a snake, which he holds with one claw and his beak. With the other claw he is balanced on a spiny nopal cactus growing on a rock in the middle of a lake. This picturization of an extremely difficult position illustrates the Aztec fable of the founding of the ancient city that is now the capital of the Mexican republic.

Proud Boast Is Old

The germ of the idea of the sun never setting on the dominions of a particular ruler is found in Herodotus, Book VII, Chapter 8. The boast was a common one with the Spaniards in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth centuries and is frequently alluded to in the literature of other countries. It does not seem to be recorded who first used the expression the sun never sets upon the British empire. John Wilson, who wrote under the pen name of Christopher North (1786-1854), in his Noctes Ambrosianae, No. 20, April, 1829, says, "His majesty's dominions on which the sun never sets." This appears to be the first use of the expression in English literature.

Liberty Cap

In early Roman times, only freemen were permitted to wear caps. When a slave was manumitted, a small cap, usually of red felt, was placed on his head, and his name was registered in the city tribes. Several Roman commanders hoisted such caps on spears to indicate that all slaves who joined them should be free; and when Caesar was murdered, the conspirators marched forth in a body, with a cap elevated on a spear, in token of liberty.

In the French revolution, the liberty cap was adopted by the revolutionists as a badge of their freedom.

Why Paint Cracks

Paint that is cracked in small hair lines sometimes running parallel, and often running crosswise on the grain, usually indicates improper drying between coats or an improper composition in the paint. Quite often this is due to applying a quick-drying top coat over a slow-drying or improperly dried under coat. The top coat cannot contract and expand uniformly with the under coat. Sometimes a paint containing a large proportion of zinc oxide in the top coat may be the cause.
