SPIRIT OF OPTIMISM

DEL-MAR-VA PENINSULA SMILES AT FUTURE

That there is a very deknite wave of optimism regarding future business conditions, especailly as they apply to the Del-Mar-Va Peninsula, and that there is indisputable evidence that the Peninsula has suffered less and has brighter propects than many other sections of the country, is the statement issued by officials of the Del-Mar-Va Eastern Shore Association. It is based upon views of men who are thoroughly familiar with economic conditions especially as they apply to agricultural sections.

Among authorities quoted at Del-Mar-Va Association headquarters as rating Del-Mar-Va above the majority of other sections which depend upon agricultural pursuits is George W. Grubb, of New York City, who in representing one of the national travel services journeys regularly from the far North to Far South and throughout middle West. Mr. Grubb has covered the Peninsula enroute from New York to Florida on an average of three times each year for the last seven years. He voluntarily states that in all of his recent journeys there is more evidence of substantial progress and sound prosperity throughout Del-Mar-Va than in any other section wwhich he visits. This, he stated, is emphasized in the upkeep of both rural and community properities and the tone of optimism found in practically all Peninsula communities as compared with the despondent and pessimitic view in other sections.

Statements made by Association members from each of the fourteen counties concur that with a return to more normal price conditions farming prospects here at the present time are superior to those which have existed during the last ten years. One authority, representing an international concern dealing direct with an essential agricultural necessity, and who has been familiar with farming conditions through Del-Mar-Va over a considerable period of years, states that there is every indication of a prosperous season ahead, under normal weather conditions, and that there is a wide spread feeling that the following year will be one of the brightest in history for agricultural pursuits as they are followed on the Peninsula.

One of the most active business leaders who has participated in the Del-Mar-Va movement since its origin stated frankly at the recent meeting of the Official Board that the Del-Mar-Va Peninsula is experiencing a better economic condition today than any other section of the United States. He said this is due to the continued efforts of cooperation on the part of individuals and communities and mentioned that every community should participate in support of the movement through their local organization, as benefits derived by one will prove beneficial to all.

Edwin C. Totten, Executive Secretary of the Association, following the recent meeting of the Official Board said that he has never recorded more optimistic views or witnessed a more sincere expression of belief in future prosperity than that presented by the members of the Official Board representing Del-Mar-Va's fourteen counties.

Pauline Solved Her Puzzle

By RUBY DOUGLAS

(Copyright.)

PAULINE VERLANE was a librarian in a college town. She was as accustomed to the youthful face of the opposite sex as was a waitress in a railroad station lunch counter to a ham sandwich. Apollo, himself, had he walked up to her desk and asked for a copy of Kingsley's Heroes, could not have made her turn a muscle of her neck.

"I'm all fed up on these college lads," she remarked one day to some girls who had dropped in to walk home with her.

"What have they done now, my dear?" asked one of the girls.

"Nothing more than usual. As soon as they get to be sophomores they begin to call me Polly, and it happened today that a new crop of them came in and it—"

"Sort o' got your goat, Polly, isn't that it?" finished her friend.

Polly laughed. "That's as good a way to put it as any."

It was not long before Polly was in her usual good humor and then one of the girls ventured:

"Many girls would give their fur coats to be in your position. Such an opportunity to meet all the nice college men."

"They could have the job if I didn't need the money," confessed the librarian.

"Just what do you like in the man line?"

"Nothing young, anyway."

"Going to be an old man's darling?"

"If anybody's," said Polly dryly.

They left her at her gate and walked on up the street toward their various homes. As girls will, they discussed their friend of the library. And as girls will, also, they decided to have a little fun at her expense.

A few days later a serious-voiced person asked Miss Pauline Verlane for a dictionary of obsolete and archaic words.

She glanced up at him casually and saw that he was not a college student. She gave him the titles of several such volumes and said that she would get for him as many of them as he liked.

"One will do, for the present—any one," he said gloomily.

He had seated himself at a reference table and she placed the book before him. He thanked her without looking up and, although she could not help contrasting his lack of gallantry with the too-effusive manners of the college lads, she rather liked his matter-of-fact way of going about what he wanted. He was wasting no time.

Polly became very busy and absorbed in other patrons and did not give the man another thought until, a day or two later, he arrived again, gloomier than ever and asked for another such volume together with Bulfinch's Mythology.

This time Polly watched him. Sure enough! He was doing crossword puzzles.

"What ever can that old gloomy creature find in cross-word puzzles?" she remarked to one of the girls as they all walked home together again. "It puzzles me—the psychology of such a case."

"At least it's a change from your jazzy college lads."

"And a pleasant one," agreed Polly. "Oh, don't misunderstand me, girls—I quite like the old fellow. There is something in his personality that appeals to my sympathy. He seems old before his time."

Indeed, Polly found the strange patron of the library so interesting that in every spare moment she found herself trying to help him with his puzzles.

One rainy afternoon they sat in a corner of the reference-room after Polly was off duty and worked out, together, a particularly difficult cross-word problem.

The man took off his great horn-rimmed glasses and he had tumbled his hair about in his earnest thought over the puzzle. Polly looked at him, curiously.

"What is the matter?"

"It's you—you looked so old and gloomy when you first came in here some weeks ago and now—"

"Do you suppose it's the puzzles that have rejuvenated me?" he asked, still beaming on her with a smile that was anything but obsolete.

"It is something," said Polly. And for some reason or other, she blushed.

"There is a wonderful flush of youth on your own face just now, if you don't mind my telling you," he said.

And then it all came out. He was not yet thirty and he was a college student. He had remarked to one of his girl colleagues that he quite liked the little librarian.

The girls, with his co-operation, had conceived the idea of his coming before Polly's notice in the guise of an antique person.

"You're sure, Polly dear," he said to her after all the explanations had been made, "that you will like me as well young—as old?"

Polly nodded.

"And you do not mind the subterfuge I had to resort to to get you to notice me? All's fair, you know, in love."

Polly admitted that it was.

"And you will marry me when—when I get about a year older?" he laughed.

And Polly said yes.

Not Quite the Same

A maid in the home of a well known Springfield individual caused a sensation in the kitchen recently when she announced that the head of the house had just informed her that "he wanted beer for dinner."

Since the man was known to be an ardent total abstainer, before the order was complied with a cautious inquiry was instituted. This disclosed that what was really said by the man was: "I won't be here for dinner."—Springfield Union.

1931

The year 1930 has passed into history, its last chapter has been written of every trade and profession. It has brought many changes, some of which will affect our business lives very much in 1931.

Adjustments and reductions in the prices of many commodities have been made and these changes are reflected in our prices.

You may have paid a certain price for an article here a month or two ago, but do not take for granted that our price on that same article is the same today.

We want to assure you that every change in prices will be passed on to our customers. We want you to feel when buying at this store that you are being given the benefit of our careful buying, from many markets on a cash basis. All of these benefits we pass on to you in every department, whether your purchases be large or small.

We solicit a reasonable share of your patronage in 1931. Let us help you make 1931 a successful year.
