OXFORD BOAT WRECKED

MODEL OF "SPRAY" GOES ON REEF

The story of how the Baselisk, a small sailing boat built at Oxford, Md., was wrecked in a West India hurricane was related last week.

Captain Konley, of Oxford, built the Baselisk, and the construction was an exact duplicate of the Glouster fishing boat, "Spray" which sailed around the world several years ago, and of which much has been written. The Spray, although small and drawing only four feet of water, was reported to live out any ocean storm and the model, Baselisk, would probably have held up this reputation were it not for a coral reef in the West Indies.

The boat was built for Captain Gilbert Klingle and on its completion he and a companion set sail for the West Indies on a mission for the American Historical Society of New York to obtain specimens of lizards of that section of the country. The story of the voyage was related on Sunday last to Mr. Conley by Captain Klingle, and it reads like some of the sea tales so popular many years ago.

After leaving Oxford, they were at sea only four days when the barometer warned them of impending danger. It dropped to 28, and then a hurricane struck the little craft and tossed her about for five days.

Finally the storm subsided and at the expiration of 4 or 5 more days another hurricane struck them. They were in sight of the West Indies, and hove, to, bu the Baselink drifted on a coral reef and th storm washed her over the reef, where she was wrecked.

The captain had his equipment aboard, worth about $9,000. This was saved, but the boat was lost. This happened just fifteen days after the boat left Oxford. The two men continued their mission, however, and remaind away six months.

During this tim 1,000 specimens were collected, which they delivered to the American Historical Society. Captain Klingle was so well pleased with the sailing qualities of his boat that he has already told Mr. Conley as soon as the depression is over he expects to have him build another exactly like the Spray and the Baselisk which he lost.
