POISONIOUS SNAKES OF STATE DWINDLING

FORESTER SAYSE SPECIES ONCE KILLED DAILY ARE BEING WIPED OUT

Kent County has never been bothered much with poisonous snakes. Several have been caught here, though, and some years ago Dr. Hall, of Washington College, used to ship any he could find out to the University of Michigan. In Cecil county and the Western Shore, copper heads and rattlers have never been hard to find, but according to the State Forester in those secions they are growing scarce.

Poisonaus snakes of everal different species are still found in fairly large numbers in the less-populated sections of the State, but not in ufficient numbers to attract any wandering tribe of Hopi Indian snake dancers to settle here, Garl E. Pfeiffer, Assistant State Forester, declared this week.

Rattlers are sill killed each year in the mountainous sections of Western Maryland, but they are fast succumbing to the advances of civilization and the growing urge on the part of youth to camp out.

"It was only a few years ago," Mr. Pfeiffer said, "that we were receiving reports on nests of rattlers being found in diferent sections of our forest preserves in the western counties."

"Our men hardly make a survey trip without finding and killing numbers of these snakes daily. But the time seems to have changed and the age-old grievance of man against the them out.

"Just the other day I was told that a ratler six feet long and as big around as a man's arm had been killed by a wood chopper. Campers along the Patapsco river and other tenting grounds in the State find that copperheads sill are to be found there. But even these snakes are fast disappearing."

He said that it is an almost unheard of thing now for people tramping through the woods and muntains to be bitten by a snake and predicted that it will not be long before persons who want to get a close-up look at a native Maryland reptile will have to go to the snake house in a zoo.
