STAR SKETCHES

Could speak French, English and German before she was twelve

Her father was an officer in the Imperial Army.

Forced to give up a promising violin career because of a weakened left hand.

Discovered by Director von Sternberg in a Berlin Music Hall.

Story of MARLENE DIETRICH by Gary Cooper

IT is April 1930, you have just turned on your radio, settled yourself to enjoy an evening at home, with the warmth of approaching Spring. On the air there is a song, not a song from the night clubs, but rather a caress...a simple song...a song of love...a voice calm and cool. It is Marlene Dietrich singing her greeting to America; a frightened European girl, alone among strangers, and already longing to immediately return to home and familiar surroundings.

To her home where her father had been an officer in the Imperial German army; to where her mother was a woman of high social standing, with an unusual musical talent. However, she is not destined to retreat, for it is this old-world background that is to enable her to conquer America and the world.

It is the early training that enabled her to converse in English and French as well as her native German before she was twelve, the training that made her an accomplished violinist, the genius that enabled her to complete her education in Berlin while still in her teens; it is this more than just fate that is to carry Marlene Dietrich to the hearts of America.

It is April, 1932. Marlene Dietrich has just thrilled you in "Shanghai Express." You marvel. You were not in the theatre; you had been carried away to China, to know and feel the life in the war zone. But that genius which lifted you out of your hum-drum world was the result of devoted study of the theatre and its allied expressionistic forms by Fraulien Dietrich in the school of dramatic art conducted by the world-famous Max Reinhardt.

She studied with an intensity of purpose that is her chief characteristic in all things she does. Apparently she is indefatiguable; she drives herself by force of will and strength of body to what in an ordinary woman would be the point of exhaustion. But Marlene Dietrich never reaches that point. From there she carries on. I remember particularly during the filming of "Morocco" that although we sometimes worked 20 hours a day, she never tired nor did her vivacious spirit change.

It is summer, 1932, but tonight we will not turn to our radios. The lights are turned out in the living room... Marlene Dietrich's latest picture is in town.

Mrs. Robert C. Young, one of the guests composed the following poem and read it at the party:

DEDICATED TO DOCTOR AND MRS. URIE

(By Mrs. Robert C. Young)

On the tenth day of January,
Nineteen, thirty three:
Doctor and Mrs. Urie,
Are going to sail the sea.

We have gathered here this evening,
To celebrate the event:
And we wish them well on their voyage
As they leave the shores of Kent.

We would like to go with them,
But some must remain behind:
For there is lots of work for each to do,
Work of the various kind.

Work of the different societies,
Not one must go to waste,
And it is up to us to do our best
To fill Mrs. Urie's place.

Of course a place is hard to fill,
Where one has so faithfully stood:
And we look about and ask ourselves
Have we done all we could?

We'll miss you Doctor and Mrs. Urie,
More than once our hearts will yearn:
But we'll wait and listen for the blue-bird,
That will herald your return.

"God bless you on your vacation,
May you both find joy and love:
For the Eye that has watched o'er you,
Will still watch you from above.

And when your visit is over:
And homeward bound you come,
May all be here to greet you:
With not a missing one.

Dr. and Mrs. Urie expect to spend the winter in Florida.
