The Wayside Poet

By J. Thomas Price

AT MOTHER'S KNEES IN PRAYER

I love to think of days gone by,
When I was but a little boy.
When Mother dear, was ever near,
Her love filled all my heart with joy;
She cooked the nicest things to eat,
She made me pretty things to wear,
And then, when bed-time came around,
She call me to her knees, in prayer.

Those childhood days, so full and free,
With Mother, ever watching o'er;
When hurt at play I'd weeping call,
My Mother, standing at the door—
Would hasten to her little boy,
And kiss the tears away, such care.
But the most sacred memory,
Is at my Mother's knees, in prayer.

Those days were care-free days to me;
The heart-breaks since that day, have come
I've known the bitterness of tears.
The way has been quite rough and long.
But when the burdens heavy grow,
I think of child-hood days so dear,
And long for one more sacred hour,
At my dear Mother's knees, in prayer.

The dear old house is vacant now,
These memories are but a dream.
My Mother, in her Heavenly home,
Lives free from toil and care and pain;
But when the cruel burdens press,
And I am overcome with care,
I find the Secret-Place, and feel
I'm at my Mother's knees in prayer.
