The Road To Better Health

IMMUNITY AND RESISTANCE
BY DR. WILLIAM J. SCHOLES

Some tell us vital resistance doesn't mean anything. Others go so far as to say it doesnt even exist. In my opinion, both groups are all wrong.

As is well known we are surrounded at all times by harmful factors capable of destroying life, and it stands to reason that nature would not let us go unprotected against these dangers. As a matter of fact, did we not have some weapon for fighting these enemies, the human race would have become extinct centuries ago.

So our common sense tells us that every living organism must possess the capacity for resisting the dangerous influence that encompass it, if it is to survive. This capacity I call vital resistance. Some call it immunity.

Difference Between Immunity and Resistance

The measure of resistance we possess protects us against ALL dangers (excepting, of course, accidents). Immunity, however, safeguards us against a certain disease, only. Thus we may possess immunity to smallpox, but not to typhoid, whereas we have a certain amount of resistance to both.

Lowered Resistance

Vital resistance may be reduced in a variety of ways. Loss of sleep, malnutrition, fatigue, alcoholism are examples of factors through which resistance to disease may be broken down.

If our capacity to withstand disease is founded solely on immunity to different diseases, why is it that we do not contract those diseases when expoed to them in our unimmunized state? I have at no time in my life been immune to pneumonia, but I haven't had pneumonia, although I have been repeatedly exposed to it and have had pneumonia germs in my throat.

How did I escape having pneumonia? Were the germs weak sisters? Or, was I too strong for the germs? If my blood detroyed them as fast as they multiplied in the past, why may it some day fail to do this and I succumb to the disease? What should make my blood fail to do at one time what it succesfully does at another time?

All of which convinces me that so long as we keep our vital forces at par we will be safe against disease—immunity or no immunity.
