I remember before we came to Chestertown, we lived on a high hill overlooking the James River. It was a beautiful stream as it flowed along showing islands that dotted it here and there. There were willow trees growing on the islands and usually it was a very peaceful stream, but after a steady rain, all would be changed. The river would become a raging current and one by one the willow trees would disappear. Then our childest hearts were terrified lest the river would over-flow the ton as it had done on several occasions, causing untold damage and loss of life.

When we were to move to Chestertown we were told that the river was a tide water river and there could never be a freshet. But it has certainly been proved that on occasions it can be very angry and cause a great unconvenience and damage. There was a very high tide in 1876, it is said, brought on by a heavy rain and south east wind. This wind blows the water from the bay into the river causing it to over flow its banks. Then the lower part of Water Street was submerged, and as the Chester River Wharf is in that direction it as under water and those who wished to take the boat to Baltimore had to be rowed out, to the landing. It was also necessary to row the pedestrians from one side of the street to the other.

In August 1893 there was one of the highest tides then ever witnessed here. The water was nine inches above the mean level, and six inches higher than in 1876. Many were unable to cook anything and therefore had to depend on their friends who lived on higher levels. These storms are apt to visit this locality in August. One old colored man, in asking him something about the boat said shaking his head. "You had better wait until after the "Cyclopial storm." But the real "Cyclopial" storm visited us on Aug. 22. The rivers stormed and pitched driven by the wind. Great trees were torn up by their roots, crashing everything in their way while the rain poured and lashed making it almost impossible to venture out. Electric wires were down and those, who like the foolish virgins, had no oil in their lamps, had to stumble about by the flickering lights of the candle. There was no water for the water pump was operated by electricity, fridgidaires stopped freezing and things were terribly disarranged. And all this time the tide was coming in. The parts of Water street which are usually affected by high tides were deep under the water while at the other end the water was approaching the curb on the side of the street away from the river. Of course cellars were flooded up town and down. One man who had a high water mark on his house said the water rose a foot above the mark of 1893.

Our beautiful peaceful river that flows so serenely by, tried to see how much mischief it could do as it raged along, sweeping all obstructions from its path.

It took up the Quaker Neck Wharf and put it in front of Mrs. Toby's pretty bungalow, giving untold trouble to the young couple who were summering there, and flooding Cliffs City and compelling a New York Professor and his family to wade out of their attractive little homes and seek shelter with their neighbors who lives on high ground.

There was lots of damage done to piers at Tolchester, at Rock Hall and Betterton by the Bay, and the storm played havoc with corn, tomatoes and fruit, but to think the peaceful Chester could belie its name and became a raging torrent makes us feel that appearances are deceitful.. However the river winds itself around the hearts of those who know it. One who has travelled much, and is now living in California, said, not long ago, that the height of his ambition is to have a bungalow on the Chester.

Fashions

In spite of the extremely sensible fashions that has been with us in the past six or seven years the elaborate styles of the nineties are returning. Gradually the large sleeves, the corseted figure, looking like an hour glass seem to be creeping in.

Dust Ruffls are coming in too, with all the extra trimmings, are we losing our idea of simplicity and corfort in dress.

By LUCY PARK

Suits have grown steadily in fashion importance for the last few seasons, until this fall they promise to reach the peak of their popularity. No matter how difficult you are to please, you are certain to find just the suit which meets your requirements if you shop about a bit, for never has there been so much diversity in cut, color and fabric.

In contrast with formal clothes, which are going in for black in a big way, tweeds promise to be more colorful than ever. For September wear there are bright yellowy greens, a whole range of reds from rust to wine shades, and bright or grayblues. Eel gray, which is a warm shade with a brown cast, on the taupe order, and oxford gray are two shades which promise to hold good through the winter. Hairy tweeds, on the kemp order, are popular weaves, and there are many new woven stripes and diagonals and nubby mixtures to choose from.

One skirt matches the coat, which is in a new copper rose shade of tweed. The other skirt matches the black jersey blouse, which is trimmed with the tweed. The coat has padded rolls over the shoulders, and tucks to give a hint of fullness. It is equally smart over the black two-piece frock, or with its own matching skirt and black blouse.

JACKETS BELTED OR PLAIN

The short belted coat, with tuxedo collar of fur, is an excellent choice in a suit which may be worn well into the season.

Equally new-looking is the suit, with coat slightly longer than hip-length, and double-breasted fastening. Suits of this type are being made with very wide shoulders and slightly nipped-in waistlines, which give a suggestion of the Victorian silhouette. One is in an oxford gray tweed, with a pronounced horizontal weave. The buttons are of aluminum.

DUST RUFFLES

Trains and dust ruffles are another revival from the same period. Practically every formal evening frock of the season has a silhouette molded to the knees, with fullness below ending in a brief train. Sometimes the frock is finished with a pleated ruffle, and sometimes mounted over a ruffled, and sometimes mounted over a ruffled slip.

SHE MAKES MONEY BY TELEPHONE!

We know a farm woman who sells many things by telephone. In one season it is strawberries. At other times it is eggs, cream, dressed poultry. People pay her a premium to get things fresh from the farm. She says these telephone sales bring many additional dollars into the family purse.

Your telephone can help make your farming profitable. Yet the cost is only a few cents a day.
