ODD BUT TRUE

Facts And Figures On Your Telephone

By EDWIN F. HILL

Edwin F. Hill

By-products of telephone communication developed by the Bell Laboratories have done much to alleviate suffering, to provide wholesome means of entertainment and the general promotion of human happiness. Interesting apparatus developed by the scientists and engineers in their research work to better the transmission and sound of the human voice include the artificial larynx, which enables those whom disease has robbed of their speaking voices to speak again; the electrical stethoscope used by surgeons throughout the world in heart ailments; development of the public address system, and radio broadcasting, which enables speakers to enlarge their visible audiences of a few hundred into invisible audiences of millions. Then there are the perfectly synchronized talking motion pictures and the transmission of pictures over telephone wires.

These are among the many projects developed and put to practical use by the telephone scientists for the benefit of humanity in general.

When Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone in 1876, his workshop became the first telephone laboratory. The present organization is composed of several thousand scientists, engineers, and experts, who are constantly engaged in improving the transmission of the human voice across space and in providing better telephone service here, there, and everywhere.
