Caler: I saw your mother going into a neighbor's as I came down the street. Do you know when she will be back?

Bill: Yes, Ma'am, she said she'd be back just as soon as you left.

Facts And Figures On Your Telephone

By EDWIN F. HILL

Edwin F. Hill

Today one person in every hundred in the United States is either employed by the telephone industry or has money invested in it. This is an indication of the interest in telephone communication. There are now approximately 17,000,000 telephones serving every section of the country from which about 77,000,000 calls are made each twenty-four hours. Not only is there an exchange of communication between the telephone users of the United States, but the service has been extended to almost all of the leading countries of the world.

Canada, Cuba and Mexico, next door neighbors of this country, are connected by land lines or under-sea cables, while the leading countries of Europe, Asia, Australia, South America, Central America, the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippines are within reach of the Bell System network by radio telephone channels, which make it possible to exchange communications between more than 90 per cent of the total 33,000,000 telephones in the world.

Less than sixty years ago there was not a single telephone in existence. The first conversation between two telephones was held March 10, 1876. By 1880 the number of telephone stations in this country had increased to 30,872. Conversation was then limited to forty-five miles. In ten years the number of telephones had increased to 211,500 and the distance that the human voice could carry was 900 miles.

By 1900 long distance telephone communication had become more general and the principal cities, towns and communities of the eastern half of the United States could converse with each other, but it was not until 1915 that the continent was spanned. In 1921 telephone service was extended to Cuba, then in 1927 to Europe, and subsequently to far-flung outposts in almost every part of the world.

Communication moves forward and today people speak with each other almost everywhere.
