The Road To Better Health

CHOOSING A VOCATION

By DR. WILLIAM J. SCHOLES

Only a small fraction of people make a success of their life for no other reason than that they are in the wrong vocation A certain engineer would have made a better salesman; this cabinet-maker would have been a good musician; that doctor should have been a shoe-maker. They are square pegs in round holes.

The old idea was that the son follow in the father's footsteps. If the father was a lawyer the son was expected to be a lawyer. True, economic considerations had something to do with this system. But in most cases it failed to prove out satisfactorily.

How many times is the son of a noted father as great in a particular field as was the father? Does the prominent preacher's son ever become a noted divine? Rarely! Will the namesakes of our most belligerent and aggressive President or the fiery, leonine Senator ever achieve the fame of their fathers? I doubt it.

One of the most important questions confronting any boy is what he will be when he reaches man's estate. Some boys are such strong admirers of their dad they want to "look like him, be like him, and do like him when they get big." That explains why some follow in their father's footsteps.

Some, probably the majority, may be strong admirers of their father in their early childhood but when they reach the knowing age of sixteen they decide that the old boy is slipping, and at eighteen that he certainly made a poor job of his life. At twenty they wonder how such a dumb father could have such a smart son, and after pondering the question at some length decided it is simply one of those odd pranks nature plays and that she was extremely prodigal with intelligence in his particular case.

In selecting his life, work he should consider his liking for certain work and the special opportunities for success he may have in a particular field. It would be extremely foolish to engage in work which one despises even though it holds out promise of large financial returns.

Despite all these considerations, however, many will find themselves in the wrong niche unless a more certain method for determining individual fitness is devised. Just because a boy wants to be an engineer doesn't signify that this is what he should do. He may be no more suited to this profession than the stage. Or, perhaps, he should be an actor, and doesn't realize it.

One industry, the General Electric Company, puts all applicants for work through a series of tests which quite accurately determine their fitness for certain jobs. So much so that those who do well in a certain test succeed in that job, while those who make a poor showing in that test fai in that job.
