LADY GODIVA

In picking up Tennyson this morning the eye fell on the story of Lady Godiva, a story that has lived for centuries, and which one remembers whenever he goes to the quaint English City of Coventry with its three tall towers which are the first thing one sees as he enters the gate.

Lady Godive was the wife of Eric, the grim earl of Mercia who was ruler of Coventry in the 11th Century. The story goes that he oppressed the people with such heavy taxes that the women went with their children to Lady Dodiva, begging her to intercede with her husband for them; that if they had to pay what was required, their children would starve to death.

Promising to do what she could for them, she prepared to go to her husband. How she dreaded it, for he was a stern, hard man. She told him of the condition of the people and plead with him to remit the tax. Loughing at her tears, he said, "Oh, Laughing at her tears, he said, "Oh, not let your little finger ache for such as these."

Lady Godiva replied that she would even die, and asked him to let her prove to him that fact. Knowing her sweet modesty and gentle dignity, he said, as he left her, "Then ride you without clothes through the town, and I will remit the tax, and gaily he went his way, never dreaming that she would do it.

But Lady Godiva sent a herald forth and bade him cry with sound of trumpets, the hard condition, and asked all the people whom she knew loved her well, that all doors and windows should be closed.

Never was the village streets so quiet, not a door nor window was opened as the Lady Godiva, veiled in her thick tresses which reached below her waist, rode down them on her milk white palfrey.

How her heart and pulses beat as she rode along, and when at last the ride was over, she clothed herself again and went to meet the Earl her husband.

He was, indeed, astounded to know that she had carried out his command, and knowing that his promise had been rung from tower to tower, he granted her wish and took the tax away. It has been many years since then but still the mothers tell their children fo the great sacrifice that the Lady Godiva made for them.

Perhaps this is a legend, like many others, but the people of the City of Coventry still speak of the Lady Godiva as their patroness and the guides tell the tale to the tourists who visit there. In this same city it is stated that at one time it had a military garrison of such repute that a woman seen conversing with a red coat was at once reckoned an outcast. The citizens would hold no intercourse with the soldiers, not even the officers. So noturally the young officers hated to be sent to Coventry. Hence the expression which is often used when anyone is excluded from polite socety, that he is "sent to Coventry," and it is as much dreaded as it was in that ancient city.

TRAVEL

The Woman knows all about the dire influence the movies have on people. She recalls this specific incident:

Filled with reverence, she was standing in Hestminster Abbey near the statue of the statesmen. The silence held her, calm and peaceful.

A group of tourists, behind their black-gowned guide, scuffiled past the Woman, their eyes peering into the gloom of the Abbey. They looked quite awed, but not altogether at ease and happy. Here was something they had been told they must see, but it was way above and beyond them.

One couple, obviously from the Woman's native land, stopped near her to gaze with happy recognition upon a statue of Disraeli.

"Oh Min," breathed the young man in a delighted whisper, "Isn't that great, look at George Arliss."

HOUSEHOLD HINTS

Boiled Dressing

3 eggs, 1 cup vinegar, 2 teaspoons of sugar, 1 teaspoon of corn starch, 1 tablespoon of butter, ½ cup of milk.

Beat eggs, vinegar, sugar and butter together and cook in double boiler. Let boil a few minutes, then pour slowly into the milk in which the corn starch is dissolved. Replace in double boiler and let it cook for a few minutes. Season to taste and beat it until it cools.

In these dusty days it is well to have a covered broom with which to dust the floor. Get a yard of outing flannel of gray or dark brown and make a ruffled skirt with a drawing string for an old broom and go over the floors each morning with it. This skirt can be removed and shaken or washed at any time. It is a labor saver.

SUMMER COATS

August is nearly here and those who are taking thought for vacation.

No matter how complete the wardrobe, it is always necessary to buy a few new things. While marked down summer fashions may present a great temptation, the wise girl makes her more important purchases with an eye to wearing them with satisfaction when she returns home from her vacation.

With this in mind, satin will recommend itself for both daytime and evening, for it promises to be one of the successes of the early fall. Satin evening frocks, in white and such pastels as ice blue and pale apple-green will be just as geed in September and October as they are right now.

SPORT SUITS

Of course you are going to want a summer looking sports things to add to your present equipment. A perfect type of coat, light in weight but with just the right amount of protection from sudden breezes, is in knitted wool and rabbit's hair, in waffle effect. This material is firm enough to tailor beautifully, and comes in a variety of bright and pastel shades, includng the smart butter yellow in which it is sketched.
